ADDRESS TO THE PUBLIC.

ON THE COMPLETION OF THE TWENTY-FOURTH VOLUME.

WITH the grateful return of the season for paying the tribute of our acknowledgment to our numerous Subscribers and Patrons, we have the pleasure of feeling an encouragement beyond that of any former period. This, we humbly presume, is the natural result of a long-established, and increasing confidence on the part of our Readers, and the Public at large. For the Correspondence, to which we hope our candour will not cease to entitle us, we shall always retain the warmest sensations of reciprocal obligation. However, still open to improvement, we hope we shall not rest in the imaginary security of having reached our ne plus ultra; but continue to pursue the prime object, of mixing the mirthful and the useful in every pleasing variety of shape, in which they may present themselves to the hand of care, or the eye of discernment. The uninterrupted course of years has shewn that our resources of entertainment are not likely to become exhaustible, or our provision stale or vapid. In fine, if lending to many, and borrowing of few, must be admitted as indications of substantial abundance, several writers who have, at different times, undertaken to provide an occasional viaticum for the sporting world, have derived some of their best made dishes, the highest seasoning, and the gayest of their garniture, from the cornucopia of the SPORTING MAGAZINE.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

We think, with deference, that our old correspondent, who signs himself a Detector of Pedantry, Plagiarism, and Literary Imposture, has fastened with too much acrimony upon the communications of Lycophontes, Venator, &c. We have no objection to any dispassionate statement of argument, or fact; but, before we insert his remarks, must beg him to defecate them at least of some portion of their virus.

A. B. and several other correspondents, are only in arrear through a press of temporary matter.

Gentlemen disposed to favour the Publisher of this Magazine with Original Paintings of Sporting Subjects, are assured that the utmost care shall be taken of them, and of their being safely returned. The Engravings thus taken, will be executed by the most approved Artists, and in the first style of excellence.

SPORTING MAGAZINE;

FOR SEPTEMBER, 1804.

New Publications on Sporting Subjects.

WE have to notice the appearance of a quarto volume, embellished with engravings, entitled "The Sporting Directory," by Richard Badham Thornhill, Esq. and of which we propose to speak in our next Magazine; likewise to furnish some interesting extracts.

WE have also to notice a second volume of Bewick's Birds—thus entitled "History of British Birds." The figures engraved on wood by T. Bewick. Vol. II. Containing the History and Description of Water Birds.

This celebrated Engraver on Wood has been long admired for his exquisite taste in the novel and improved art of what is termed "Wood Cut Engraving."

We shall reserve ourselves for farther notice of this ingenious and laborious work, in some future Magazine.

GAMEKEEPERS.

For the information of our Readers, we copy the following Article and Letter from the provincial paper named therein, and which is not less celebrated for its general intelligence, than for its uniform accurate reports of sporting occurrences.

MANORIAL RIGHTS.

NO Lord can appoint any man to be a killing gamekeeper, except he be a menial servant. Nor can any such appointment legally qualify a person to sport, without that person have some other qualification. The knowledge of this circumstance may prevent penalties.—York Herald.

To the Editor of the York Herald.

SIR—A paragragh having appeared in your paper of the 8th instant, stating that no Lord of a Manor can appoint any gamekeeper, with power to kill game, except he be a menial servant; and that no such such appointment will legally qualify a person to sport, without he have some other qualification; the former part of which I think erroneous, and the latter too general, and requiring explanation; I have been induced to examine the subject with some attention, and hope you will find the following information may be relied on.

Any Lord of a Manor, not under the degree of an Esq. may, by writing under his hand and seal, appoint one person (but not more) to be gamekeeper within any one manor, with power to kill game; and the person so appointed must either be qualified by the laws of this realm so to do, or be truly and properly a servant to the Lord of the Manor, or be immediately employed and appointed to take and kill the game for the sole use or immediate benefit of such Lord, and not otherwise.

It will be seen, therefore, that three descriptions of persons are eligible to be appointed; but unless the person be otherwise qualified, his name must, before he kills game, be entered with the clerk of the peace where the manor lies, who is to grant a certificate thereof, on payment of one shilling; which entry was required long before, and is still required, independently of the game certificate stamp acts.—The mistake of your correspondent has probably arisen, from what I apprehend to be a false construction of the new stamp-duty act, page 907, schedule A. by which a duty of 1l. 1s. is to be paid on a "certificate issued to or taken out by any person, under any deputation or appointment of gamekeeper (being a menial servant) yearly;" which certificate, and the before-mentioned entry, will authorise him to kill game within the limits of the manor.

As the guinea certificate is confined to menial servants, he supposes that no other persons can be appointed; but I contend, that the only difference made by the present act is, that persons of the two other descriptions mentioned above, must take out a three-guineas certificate, instead of a guinea one; in which case, a person appointed gamekeeper, who is otherwise qualified to kill game, may sport any where: and a person immediately employed and appointed to take and kill the game for the sole use or immediate benefit of the Lord of the Manor, having also entered his name with the clerk of the peace, (whose certificate of such entry is not required to be stamped) may legally kill game within the manor: but cannot elsewhere without being liable to the 5l. penalty, as an unqualified person; and he may even do it elsewhere, without being liable to any other penalty. I must premise, however, that I confine these observations to the liability of persons sporting, to penalties under the game and stamp laws, and do not consider trespasses as a part of the subject.

All former penalties for securing the stamp duties still remain in force, and no new ones (relating to this subject) have been enacted; and it appears to me to be clear, that, under the former acts, if a gamekeeper had a three guineas certificate, he was not liable to any penalty for not taking out a guinea certificate on his deputation; the clause enacting the penalty being thus expressed: "Not having obtained some certificate, as aforesaid, under this act;" and, of course, that a general certificate will still be sufficient.

I am, Sir,

Your obedient servant,

OWEN

OWEN CARROL,

The celebrated Irish Huntsman.

THIS man died, some time since, at Duffry-hall, the seat of Cæsar Colclough, Esq. at the advanced age of 96; near 60 years of which he passed in the Colclough family. Being originally a farmer, he had such an inclination for hunting, that he always kept a horse of his own, and hunted with the hounds of Colonel Colclough, for many years; but when the late Adam Colclough set up a pack of his own, he came and hunted his hounds at first for his amusement; but as he lived at too great a distance to be always regular, Mr. C. gave him a farm near him; and he acted in the triple capacity of huntsman, steward, and master of the family. During the rebellion, in 1798, he and his family acted with uncommon fidelity to their employers; as one of his sons, when Mr. C. was obliged to fly, came down and remained to protect the house and property; and he never quitted his post. Another of his sons brought off horses and clothes to his master at the risque of his life, when he was informed where to find him; and during that period the old man buried a large quantity of the family plate, which he afterwards conveyed to a place of safety. Until the last year of his life, he regularly went out with the hounds, and his voice retained its clearness and sweetness; he was well known to all sportsmen in that part of Ireland. Mr. Kelly, the late judge, about his own age, some time since, spent a day at Duffry-hall, to see and hunt with him. At one period, his and his horse's age amounted to 106 years, and yet neither could be beat. As the custom in Ireland is to attend funerals, for 70 years he never missed one within many miles.

ON FEMALE EQUESTRIANS.

To the Editor of the Sporting Magazine.

"——Audens viris contendere virgo."

SIR,

AS a great admirer of the ladies, I am always highly delighted when any change of fashion or of manners occurs to set them off to new advantage. But nothing has ever raised my expectation higher than the splendid example lately set to the fair sex on the racing ground at Knavesmire. There is something so bold and so original in the idea of a lady publicly contending with a man, that I think it cannot fail to take prodigiously amongst all females of rank and spirit.

I know not whether it be prejudice that makes our sex discourage exploits of this sort; but I rather take it to be envy, and unwillingness to acknowledge Mrs. Wolstonecraft's doctrine of the equality of the sexes. Whatever it proceeds from, I fear it is not every husband that has the spirit and liberal feeling to permit his wife to make so public an exhibition. But I think the glory of being talked of throughout all Europe, and of being personated at Bartholomew Fair and Sadler's Wells, is inducement enough to make our women break their chains, and vindicate their right to masculine encounters. The daring challenge, so publicly thrown in the face of Mr. Flint, and maintained to his very beard, must be exceedingly animating to every sportswoman, as pointing out so clearly the way to female renown.

Until the present time, the fair sex have made but small efforts, except in the way of dress, to assume sume the likeness of ours. The farthest they have yet gone is to beat the tambour, instead of working on it; or at most to halloo and sweat after the hounds, or drive their beaux four in hand through the streets. Now, what is that to the labours of Newmarket? At one time, indeed, we had troops of female archers, forming in several quarters; but Cupid, the sly rogue! was so scared with their weapons and accoutrements, that he flew away, and gave all his arrows to the gentle damsels who had prepared none of their own. And so it is that man, stubborn man, by some wonderful law of his formation, yields to smiles or to tears, and is soonest subdued by a softness of nature the most opposite to his own.

She, therefore, who is sent with the glorious ambition of contending with man in prowess and athletic exercise, should lay aside entirely the female feelings, and renounce even the desire of courtesy, which she cannot receive without confessing her inferiority in the contest. Our heroine, it must be admitted, is somewhat defective here. Thalestris, Penthesilea, and Joan of Arc, who fought in former times with men, never sculked, as far as we know, because their opponents hit as hard as they were able. Sex was out of the question, and to have offered to make any allowance for it would have been an affront. It is because women are feeble, that it becomes a man's glory to protect them; it is, because they are gentle and submissive that men give them place and preference, and on all occasions pay them attention, homage and court. But, as soon as the lady takes up the spear and buckler, or assumes the jockey cap, a man must either contend in good earnest, or, what is better, run away.

Trusting that my fair countrywomen will take these remarks in good part, I shall employ myself diligently in tracing and recording every instance of Amazonian merit that appears; and encourage, to the utmost, every girl of spirit that lays down the needle and the lute, and betakes herself, in a manly way, to the stable and the field.

With this view I take the liberty to remark, that no great good can be done, in the way of riding matches, until the side-saddle is abolished, so as that a woman shall no longer have a right side and a wrong. This is an improvement which I recommend with great confidence, because I have been assured by an eminent breeches-maker in Moorfields, that, by means of a simple contrivance, he could remove all objection to a lady's sitting astride; and, as to the circumstance of pregnancy, I do not see much difficulty there, since an allowance of weight might be easily settled, in proportion to the advanced period or bulk.

I am, Sir,
Your obedient
Humble servant,
T.

MRS. THORNTON'S MATCH, AT YORK.

With an accurate Etching of the Race, taken on the Spot.

To the Editors of the Sporting Magazine.

GENTLEMEN,

AFTER the very ample account of the late celebrated race on Knavesmire, between Mrs. Thornton and Mr. Flint, there remains but little to say on the subject in the present instance; yet, being Celebrated Race between Mrs Thornton, and Mr Flint, at the York August Meeting, 1804.

Pub. Oct. 1804, by J. Wheble, Warwick Square.

being convinced of your earnestness to collect every information upon an event so novel and surprising in itself, I am induced to send you a few loose observations, which I have thrown together.—Should they be deemed worthy of your notice, an insertion in your next number will afford ample gratification to, Gentlemen,

Your sincere friend, W. B.

Highousegate, Sept. 24, 1804.

NOTWITHSTANDING much has been said upon this most remarkable occurrence in the sporting world, which will stand recorded in the annals of the turf, as a lasting monument of feminine intrepidity, the circumstance which gave rise to it has never yet, I believe, been publicly stated.

In consequence of the intimacy which once existed between the families of Colonel Thornton and Mr. Flint, the two ladies being sisters, the latter gentleman frequently partook of the exhilirating bottle at the hospitable board, at Thornville Royal.

In the course of one of their equestrian excursions in Thornville Park*, the Lady of Colonel Thornton and Mr. Flint were conversing on the qualities of their respective horses: and, as it generally happens where a spirit of rivalry exists, the difference in opinion was great, and the horses were occasionally put at full speed, for the purpose of ascertaining the point in dispute. In every instance did Old Vingarillo, aided by the skilfulness of his rider, distance his antagonist; which so discomfited Mr. Flint, that he was induced to challenge his fair friend to ride on a future day. This challenge was accepted (on the part of the Lady) by Colonel Thornton; and it was agreed that the race should take place on the last day of the York August meeting.

On the issue of the contest there remains little to say; yet it is but justice to observe, that if the lady had been better mounted, no doubt could have existed as to the result. Indeed she laboured under every possible disadvantage; notwithstanding which, and the very ungallant conduct of Mr. Flint, she flew along the course, with an astonishing swiftness, conscious of her own superior skill, and would, ultimately, have outstripped her adversary, but for the accident which took place.

Still confident of success, in the event of another trial, we find the following humorous article inserted in the York Herald, subsequent to the race, which, while it manifests the pleasantry of the lady, cannot, in the least degree, reflect any credit on the conduct of Mr. Flint.

MR. EDITOR,

HAVING read in your paper, that Mr. Flint paid me every attention that could be shown on the occasion of the race, I request you will submit the following Elements of Politeness to the gentlemen of the turf, for them to sanction or re-

* This rich and beautiful Enclosure, five miles in extent, is stocked with near five hundred head of deer, and abounds with game; there are also two fine lakes, which contain an immense quantity of fish. Nearly in the centre of the park stands a handsome building, called the Temple of Victory, in commemoration of the honours paid to Colonel Thornton, while he had the command of the West York Militia. It, on account of its elevated structure, commands a most extensive prospect over the surrounding country.

ject, upon any future match of this kind taking place.

Element 1. — Mr. Baker, who kindly offered to ride round with me, on account of the dangerous accident I met with on the Wednesday before, from my saddle turning round, was positively and peremptorily refused this permission.

Element 2. — At the starting-post, the most distant species of common courtesy was studiously avoided; and I received a sort of word of command from Mr. Flint, as thus—

" Keep that side, Ma'am!"

For a morning's ride, this might be complimentary; but it was here depriving me of the whip hand.

I did not expect Mr. Flint to shake hands with me, that I understand being the common prelude to boxing.

Element 3.—When my horse broke down in the terrible way he did, all the course must have witnessed the very handsome manner in which Mr. Flint brought me in, i. e. LEFT ME OUT, by distancing me as much as he possibly could.

If these should be received as precedents, the art of riding against ladies will be made most completely easy.

Challenge. — After all this, I challenge Mr. Flint to ride the same match, in all its terms, over the same course next year—his horse, Brown Thornville, against any one he may choose to select out of three horses I shall hunt this season.

ALICIA THORNTON.

Thornville Royal, Sept. 1, 1804.

The following reply, which has appeared in the public prints, may not, perhaps, be inaptly introduced in this place; on its merits, I shall leave your readers to determine.

FLINT, Respondent—to THORNTON, Appellant.

My Pegasus dull, has the honour and pride
To acknowledge your elements bright:
And first, tho' you hint that I took the wrong side,
The end of the race prov'd it right.

In courtesy, next, you are pleas'd to suggest,
That I was deficient on starting;
But to give you the lead was clearly a test,
How civil I was at the parting.

I denied you a friend to ride by, I confess,
And for why?—not for sake of the pelf;
But I wish'd to enjoy, in a case of such bliss,
All that pleasure and honour myself.

Four-fifths of the race, you must candidly own,
You had the "whip hand," while behind
I humbly pursued, till your nag "was broke down"—
Then before you to go sure was kind!

But believe to the Fair I am warmly inclin'd—
To be always polite I am ready;
Tho' my Horse was so rude as to leave you behind,
I will ne'er run away from a Lady.

To your challenge anew, I beg to reply—
When your Ladyship's made ev'ry bet,
I'll be proud to attend, the contest to try,
For the honour again of your wit.

P. S. I forgot to mention, that Mr. Reinagle, the celebrated sporting painter, is in our neighbourhood, employing his talents in finishing a fine picture of the late race, from which an elegant engraving will speedily appear. Indeed, much may be expected from the display of this gentleman's abilities, whose taste and correctness is so eminently manifest in the finished paintings lately executed for the SPORTSMAN'S CABINET.

RURAL

RURAL SPORTS AT MARGATE.

WHILE at Margate this season, I was invited to the house of a friend, at St. Laurence, and to see an annual sport exhibited at that place. It was really a fête du village, called in this country a Running Match; which is an amusement peculiar to these parts, though I had never myself seen one of the kind, either in this island or elsewhere.

As my friend, after dinner, proposed we should be spectators of it, he obligingly gave me a few particulars relative to this species of rural sports.

A certain number of young men, who are active and expert at the diversion, for a trifling sum collected among themselves, challenge each other to contend in a Running Match. They divide into two sets, as opponents, usually about eleven on a side, though sometimes more, each party wearing a particular coloured ribbon tied about their arms, to distinguish them from their adversaries.

Their method of running, as I understood, was, that each side, when they stripped for the contest, deposited their clothes for their respective goals, at the distance of eight or ten rods from one another, and thus arranged, stand prepared for the race. As soon as it is agreed which side begins, one of that side sallies from the goal, who, when he has run out about four or five rods, is marked and chased by one of his antagonists, whose endeavour it is to pursue him, so as to be able to lay his hand upon some part of his body; which if he effects, this is called giving a stroke. But to prevent this effect, he who departed second, is, after he advances four or five rods, pursued in his turn by another of the first party; and so alternately one after another, each striving, by pursuing his adversary who went out immediately before him, to divert that adversary from being able to give the stroke to the man he was aiming to lay hold of, by awakening his attention to his own security; each contender also taking every precaution in his power to keep to himself a retreat open to that goal from whence he set out.

Those racers who are expert, and have been much accustomed to this sport, will chace each other frequently for a long time, before there will be a single stroke received on either side.

As soon as it happens that a stroke is given, the race is immediately stopped, and every man returns to his respective goal. The party that has lost the stroke then renews the race as before, and whichever side obtains the first seven strokes, becomes the victor of the day.

To prevent any dispute that may arise concerning the stroke, each party, before the race begins, chooses an umpire, who are placed on the most convenient spot for observing the match, and by whose decisions all differences are adjusted.

But these are the sports of pleasure, of health, and of simplicity; far unlike those pernicious games introduced by wanton luxury, which disturb the tranquillity of the mind, and agitate every passion of the heart. Here emulation is the sole point in view, each being ambitious to shew his agility and strength. All is conducted with good humour and amity; nor is it the least pleasing part of the scene, that when the contest is over, the victors and the vanquished divide the triumph; the former expending the prize in a rural supper, prepared on the spot, at at which they are only distinguished from the latter, by sitting at the upper end of the table.

When we had walked down to the place of contention, it presented us with a most interesting scene. It was a field surrounded by a hedge that bloomed with briar roses, and wild honeysuckles. On one side was a small plantation of trees, under which was raised an awning of sail-cloth, tied from stem to stern, forming a kind of large tent, beneath which the tables for the supper were placed.

The grass was covered with many people from the neighbouring villages, assembled in their Sunday-clothes. While these formed an extended circle, and had their attention fixed on the young men who were exerting their abilities in the race, several rural females were employed in twisting wreaths of wild flowers round the bottoms of the trees that supported the tent; and others in blending together garden ones which they had brought in little baskets, into nosegays and chaplets, to present all the contenders with when the match was finished.

All the runners were stript in their shirts, with white linen breeches and white stockings; and each had a silk handkerchief tied round his waist.

Indeed nothing but habitude could produce in all of them that fleetness of foot, and the rapidity exercised in their repeated evolutions; and we may suppose that each exerted himself to the utmost, from the interest he might feel in the approbation of the rural maidens, who were spectators of the race.

Long was the contest on either side, and arduously urged on both. But now the shouts of the circling spectators declare the match decided. All run to congratulate them, and as the disputants draw toward the tent, some of the maidens present every champion with a nosegay, and each of the conquerors with one of the little chaplets they had prepared, which they immediately bind round his head.

Most of the villagers who come to the sport, now gradually retire, while the young women who are connected with the runners are busied in placing the cold supper on the tables. Every thing arranged, those who have obtained the victory, and after them the subdued, present their bouquets to the nymphs whom they wish to have next them at supper, and who is after, of course, to be their partner in the dance. It was altogether so unexpected a scene of nature and of simplicity, that I almost fancied myself in the plains of Arcadia, by seeing thus realized the fictions of poetry.

The supper ended, they all rose up at the sound of the tabor and pipe. Each taking out the partner he had before made choice of, they began the dance, which closed the evening with the same temperate festivity.

THE LINEAL DESCENT OF THE MUSES.

LETTER THE FIRST.

DEAR COUSIN,

YOU ask, when are we to see you in the country? Why, my dear, when the cuckoo has picked up all the dirt, as we used to say when good children in the country; and positively not before.

But if you will say, let us listen to the poets, and hear how sweetly they have sung the inexpressible beauties beauties of the country; I answer, have you any conception of the cause of these copious descriptions, these soft and harmonious numbers? It is ten thousand to one whether you have, or can suggest the cause; you will therefore pardon me for explaining what may seem enigmatical.

Poverty and poetry have the same initial. All poets are poor; and they usually have their residence—I should rather say, place of abode; for, poor souls, they have but seldom a residence: no, they usually abide in the uppermost regions, in some obscure corner or dark lane, where the bright beams of Sol's vivid lustre casts only a glimmering light. As to the country, they know but little of it: they seldom see it, and this is the cause of their high admiration when they do see it; for we all admire and are charmed with those things that are seldom seen, and praise those things most of which we know but little.

Poets, again, are generally so very irritable in the nervous system, so subject to colds and catarrhs, that they seldom if ever venture out of their obscure retreats, but on the brightest days, and that chiefly in the most pleasant months of spring, summer, and autumn; of course they see the fair side of the country only. The whole livery of nature is so gay, sweet, and sprightly, the scene so new, the air so refreshing, to those habituated to smoke, and many foul stenches, that they fall into raptures, are enchanted as it were into ecstatic flights of fancy and poetic raptures of description. Then they sing and rhime away like madmen. Like young men in love, they flatter, they extol, they admire; they exalt their sweet mistress to the heavens, without stopping to pay regard either to truth or reason. But trial is the touchstone that sets people right. Twenty years of matrimony, and as many years constant residence in the country, have brought many an amorous gallant and flighty poet to reason. As they grow old, knowing, and rational, their flattering descriptions, and poetic raptures cease; the wife becomes tedious, the country dull and horridly dismal.

That the country has its charms and various beauties, that have ever been admired and extolled by the wisest of human beings, I shall willingly allow, and that it is very desirable, provided one were at liberty to choose his residence and time of residing in it. But, you will say, this is paying the country a very frigid compliment, as most things are tolerable on one or the other side. Very true; I shall therefore acknowledge all poetic descriptions of the country to have been founded on truth and nice observation, if you, on the other side, will allow those charms and beauties are at least one half the year obscured by whistling winds, driving rains, pelting hail, feathered snow, roads filled with water and mire, the foot ways torn up, nowhere to set a dry foot, hedges and trees dropping, gates and stiles wet and dirty, the whole face of nature in her undress, the fields robbed of their productions, the grass withering, the leaves fallen; a cheerless gloomy scene every where presents itself to the comfortless traveller's eye; and that in all this dreary scene, there is nothing to pass or kill time, by diverting the attention, engaging the fancy, and warming and exciting the passions or imagination; no balls, no masquerades, no auctions, no public exhibition of foreign rarities, or domestic genius: no, nothing but the dull monotonous sound of the flail, thump, thump, thump, from morning to night; here an old woman paddling through the dirt, with her goodman's jacket on, dragging home a bough to make her children a comfortable blaze. On one tree sits a raven, croak, croak; on another, a magpie, chatter, chatter; the rooks and crows, hard by, cawing; while the jackdaws, from the venerable old steeple, contribute to the delightful harmony. These, with the lowing of oxen, bleating of sheep, braying of asses, wauling of cats, howling of dogs, croaking of frogs, and grunting of swine, constitute the enchantingly sublime and never-enough to be praised delights and beauties of a country life. But it is now time to give you a little news from the great city.

The most important news of the day, at least that which excites my attention the most, is the descent of the Muses, and their having changed their residence, viz. the long-famed and highly celebrated mountain, Parnassus, which was their usual abode for three thousand years, and Heaven knows how much longer.

But, that I may not scribble unintelligible riddles, it may be necessary, first, to acquaint you, that the Muses are nine venerable old virgins, and most immaculate no doubt: but where they were born, who were their progenitors, how or where they were educated, and why they were called the Muses, is all a most profound secret to me, and probably the same to all the world.

Various have been the opinions and surmises on this highly interesting secret; many volumes have been written, much knowledge and learned disquisition sported, to throw some light upon the subject; but all without effect, since the learned world is as much bewildered in the dark as ever, and no certain solution having ever been given to clear up the mysterious history of the Muses. I shall not, therefore, trouble either you or myself with quotations from what have been the opinions of others, but will think for myself; and my own reason and imagination may probably lead us both as near the truth as any former notions that have been so learnedly advanced on the subject.

Of the native country, the progenitors, and education of the Muses, I shall be silent: nice disquisitions about uncertainties are wholly useless. If a subject be understood, no matter where or by whom it was discovered, made, or invented; but the name, when properly derived, and clearly comprehended, often has a tendency to throw much light upon it.

Now, the name or appellation, Muses, seems to come directly from the verb "to muse." I shall, therefore, conclude, that the phrase "Nine Muses," is derived from "Nine Musers." They were, probably, the daughters of the same parents, and, owing to some fatality, were condemned to a life of celibacy, which kind of life is well known to lead to some formalities, thoughtfulness, rigidity, &c. which we will suppose was the case with the nine venerable sisters. Being virgins of exalted sentiments, and great knowledge, they made many wonderful discoveries, and nice remarks, on men and things, which they delivered in a particular manner and form, numbering their words as they spoke, or rather before they spoke. Here they used a long syllable, there a short one; here a soft and harmonious word, there a sonorous and harsh one, with various other particular and set niceties; all which required them to think, that is, to muse, before they spoke, and to proceed with with deliberation and the greatest circumspection. And this it was that gained the nine virgins the appellation of Musers, which time has now fashioned into Muses.

Thus much for their general name, Muses, or Musers. They were, and are, the most excellent Trio Trio, that is, Thrice Three, in all the world; the sole proprietors of sublime, dignified, and elegant language.

Calliope, the first, figured away in the elegant style. As she pleaded cases, her style was sometimes dignified and solemn, and sometimes elegant, witty, or sarcastic. She sometimes took a bold leap over prescribed rules, and introduced new modes of expression, which she called a happiness at turning a thought; and whatever belonged to her sisters she made free with.

Clio was the second. She presided over historical events; and was an intelligent, well-informed, and dignified lady.

Erato, the third, was so elegant and beautiful a virgin, that it was generally expected she would have been married very young. It fell out otherwise. When she was growing old, she began to sing and write of love, and the soft and enchanting dalliances of the young and amorous; but she was always careful of offending modesty. She rather hinted her sentiments than spoke them; yet people in general understood her meaning, which gave occasion for some to affirm, that she might as well have spoke in plain, common language. But this assertion is false; since it is more agreeable and consonant with reason and decency, to manifest good humour and pleasantry by a smile, than to contort the features, and convulse the body, by a horse-laugh.

Thalia, the fourth, presided over all that was comical and ludicrous; and she was so intent on producing various specimens of the humorous, whimsical, and ridiculous, that she became so dull and heavy in her external appearance, as to merit the name of the fourth Muser.

Melpomene, the fifth, gave up her time and attention to depict whatever is sorrowful, and all the tragical occurrences in life; and she met so little trouble in starting subjects, as almost every year produced instances of knavery, deceit, false friendship, cruelty, extravagance, slighted love, jealousy, obdurate parents, perverse undutiful children, murders, private assassinations, &c. that she became the most cheerful of the Musers.

Terpsichore, the sixth, was mistress of all ceremonies necessary to be observed at balls, masquerades, and all public assemblies, and private visiting. She was in general dull and low spirited, when alone; but free, easy, and pleasant, when in company; which is my wonder, as she had thousands of compliments, agreeable trifles, punctilios, &c. at her command, when in company, which were entirely useless to her when she was by herself.

Euterpe, the seventh, was mistress, or president, at music and logic. She constantly mused upon the affinity which sounds have to reason; and would prove any thing by stating her questions or hypotheses. For instance, she proved a fop to be a monkey, thus—A monkey has many odd tricks, and is capricious: a fop has many odd tricks, and is capricious; therefore, a fop is a monkey. 2dly, All madmen have warm imaginations: all real poets have warm imaginations; therefore all real poets are madmen. 3dly, A mule is a something between a horse and an ass: your saddle, said she to a man one day, is something between a horse and and an ass; therefore your saddle is a mule.

Polyhymnia, the eighth, was mistress of geography, or the history of the earth, which she measured and divided, and recorded the earth's various climates, productions, &c. which appeared so wonderful to those who knew nothing of the matter, that they stigmatized this intelligent virgin by the nickname of the Lying Traveller. But Polyhymnia pays no regard to the slander: she knows, that were she to live three thousand years longer, there will then remain some things undiscovered, more wonderful and astonishing than any she has yet, or may in future record.

Urania, the ninth, the most quarrelsome of the sisterhood, was always in her altitudes or metaphysics: she constantly mused upon subjects above her own comprehension, and was ever ready to abuse and quarrel with the world for not clearly understanding her mysteries. Being very elevated, she was seldom calm, scarce ever happy; yet she was frequently in a trance.

Here you will please to observe, that it was absolutely necessary for the above virgins to think and muse much, to attain to a tolerable degree of perfection in their several arts and excellencies: no wonder, therefore, that they were called the Musers; or, as modern refinement will have it, the Muses. You will likewise please to remark, that their several arts and excellencies go to the making of a poet, in the same manner as the passage, kitchen, larder, pantry, cellar, hall, parlour, chamber, and garret, all go to the completing or making a house.

The Musers, as is stated above, have emigrated; they have entirely forsaken their ancient residence, the far-famed mountain Parnassus. But the reason of this unexpected dereliction is unknown—Whether the waters of Helicon have ceased to flow; or whether the venerable sisterhood found the air too thin, and their means of subsisting too scanty and precarious; or whether it be solely owing to female caprice; is uncertain. The most probable opinion is, that they, by chance, got information of the fertility of the Thames, and the many good and comfortable accommodations in which this city so much aboundeth, and were resolved to visit Old England, and try whether report had spoken truth. However this matter may be, here they are, lodged in good quarters, among a variety of choice and high-seasoned viands; and they have already sung and celebrated those good things, in all kinds of verse, metre, and measure—iambic, anapestic, trochaic, dactyles, spondees, and heaven knows what beside. In short, they have given specimens of all their former versification; and, to own the truth candidly, the gross air of this huge metropolis, roast beef, hams, fish, rich cheese, foreign pickles, and spices, do not appear to have cast the least shade or cloud over their genius for poetry.

But what will be the consequence of this very extraordinary and novel institution of making public the various good things and merchandize of the first commercial city in the world? I cannot for my life say. What effect it will have, time alone must shew; but you know me to delight in a little anticipation; therefore, in my next, you may expect an anticipatetic—there is a new word for you!—relation of what will probably be the consequences, and effects of such a pleasing originality and novelty.

Hark! hark! That is aunt Deborah's borah's voice—"Sophia! Sophia! For Heaven's sake, girl, what are you about? Pray put a period to your letter, and come down. The maids are all busy; the company will soon be here; and here are the poor birds starving for meat and water—the lotion must be applied to Fidelia's foot at six—Poll must be caged—and the cats must be locked up in the closet, or my Lady Fidget will faint and die—And I want some powder in my hair, and a scratch or two to be obliterated on my right cheek.—For Heaven's sake despatch and come down!"

You see what a world of business lies on my hands, and will excuse an abrupt conclusion. Dear Girl, adieu.

PASSAGE THROUGH LIFE,

CONTRASTED WITH

A SPORTSMAN'S DAY.

For the Sporting Magazine.

MR. EDITOR,

WHEN first the sun's orient beams burst through the curtains of the sportsman's couch, scarcely opening his drowsy eyes, and dazzled by the splendour of the morning, he hardly knows, as it were, where he is: his faculties, for a time, seem less vigorous, his recollection indistinct, and scarce existent, while sleep has not yet entirely resigned her dominion over him. Gradually, however, awakening, his mental powers expand, and his eyes no more refuse to sustain the brilliancy of the light.

And thus the new-born infant, just produced to day, its feeble eyes shrink from the unusual glare; till, by degrees, its powers of vision are strengthened and habituaed to support the light; and its intellectual faculties, gradually expanding, comprehend and distinguish the various objects which are presented to its view.

Next we see the eager sportsman ready equipped, "armed cap-a-pee exactly" for the chace, buoyant with expected pleasure, with h e hope of succeeding in the race he has to run, outstripping his fleetest rivals in the chase, and obtaining, before all his other competitors, the deer's cloven foot, or fox's brush. He waits with impatience the unkennelling of the hounds, and hopes, in anxious expectation, the commencement of the chase: but never does he think of the dangers or accidents which may befal him in the pursuit of his diversion.

Nor otherwise the adolescent youth, now in full vigour and joy, burning for the blessed approaching moment, which will emancipate him from the restraint and severities of school, gratifying his imagination with airy visions of ideal bliss, and painting in fancy the chequered scenes of his future life, in the most splendid and flattering colours; nor once caring to suffer the idea of the various inconveniences, dangers, and miseries incident to the lot of humanity, to claim any portion of his thoughts. Happy season! when expectation has it in its power to exhilirate and please the soul! Rather than repine, let us most sincerely return thanks to the kind and omniscient Creator, who has denied the knowledge of futurity to mortals. How could youth enjoy felicity, if they could foresee every impending calamity—that a few years would plunge them in an abyss of misery and affliction, give them to the tyranny of incurable disease, or that the next day, or hour, or even minute, might offer them to the cold grasp of death, and bury them in the dreary silence of the grave?

May I be allowed to go so far as to say, that as the prudent sportsman who has carefully furnished himself with the requisites for the chase, nor neglected to make use of the good horse, the whip, and the spur, is far more likely to make a figure in the chase than the heedless sportsman who pays little attention to these essentials—so, the youth who has stored his mind with useful knowledge, is sure of being more conspicuous in the world, and more respectable in society, than the idle, lazy fellow, who has neglected these precautions.

And now the hunters are off!—Remark the various dispositions and modes of proceeding. Here one is mounted upon a fleet, but delicate and slender courser: he hopes, because he can outstrip his rivals in the race on the level plain, that speed will carry him far before the rest in the chase; but he is disappointed. For speed is not the only requisite; strength and vigour are necessary to go through the chase with glory.

And thus in the world, we see a man possessed of very quick parts, but at the same time deficient in good common sense, and in industry and application. Upon plain ground, like the racer we have mentioned, they may be very shewy and glittering; that is, in particular companies and under particular circumstances, they may captivate and arrest attention and admiration; but, in the long-run of life, they will be of little essential utility, unless guided by good sense, and accompanied with industry and application.

On the other hand, we see, perhaps, the next sportsman mounted upon a horse which, though by no means equal in fleetness to the former, yet is not totally deficient, but possesses at the same time strength and bone fit for the labour of a long and fatiguing chase: and this latter sportsman has, in my opinion, a much better chance of gaining the white-tipped brush, than the other, who is mounted on the swifter, but weaker and more slender steed. But neither ought the horse to be too strong, too clumsy, nor have too little attention paid to his outward appearance, or he will be full as much incapacitated from doing himself honour in the chase.

Thus again, in life, we see the person whose lot it has been to obtain good strong sense, and a well-cultivated understanding, pass through life, in general, happier and more respected, than the man possessed of the most shining and brilliant abilities, unaccompanied with those other more solid and essential qualifications; or than the beauish, frippery fop, who, because perhaps he has a handsome person, or a handsome face, imagines, ridiculously, that these trifles are enough to secure him a good passage through life. Care must be taken, however, that we do not fall into the opposite error of pedantry and ill manners, which will often destroy, in a great measure, the good effects of other good qualities.

Here, in the chase, we see men deviating from the path of the hounds, taking a vast number of unnecessary leaps, and running into all kinds of unnecessary dangers, by which some perhaps break their necks, and others lose the track of the hounds, never to regain it during the remainder of the chase: nay, even should some more fortunate sportsmen fall again into the track, their horses and themselves are so tired, so worn down by their useless useless and unnecessary exertions, that they are rendered completely unable to partake of the enjoyment of the rest of the chase.

Not otherwise in the journey through life—Some desert the beaten path of wisdom and of virtue, and wander aside into unnumbered extravagancies, follies, and crimes; to which some fall victims, and never regain the right path of life; and some—though they may perhaps, in their latter days, repent of their errors, and fall again into the right path—are so worn down, so debilitated, by their folly and wickedness, that they can never enjoy any future comfort.

Happy the man who, after having temperately and prudently ridden through the chase, finds his labours rewarded by the brush; who can say, that he has attained the end which he proposed to himself! He receives the congratulations of his sporting friends; and, though some may be jealous of the prize, they will inwardly applaud his prudence, and wish they had followed his course.

Thus, too, in the great world, the man who has fixed his mind upon the attainment of a praiseworthy object, who has pursued it through every unfavourable circumstance, with honour, with firmness, and integrity, nor awed by danger, nor led astray by the alluring, but fallacious temptations of vice or folly; who has ultimately attained this his desired object, and can lay his hand upon his heart and say, "I have not lived for nothing" —this man, I say, will not only receive the most perfect approbation of his own conscience, but will be sure of obtaining that of the wise and virtuous members of society; and though envy and detraction hurl unnumbered darts against his fame and reputation, firm in his own virtue, his well-known character shall resist, hard as a rock of adamant, impregnable as the Vulcanian shield of Achilles, every invidious attack; nor shall the well-hardened and highly polished metal be marked with even the slightest scratch; but every weapon opposed to it shall, in proportion as in itself the shield is hard, be returned with redoubled violence upon the attacking foe, who shall himself soon feel the all-commanding power of virtue, and while his cheeks are suffused with the deepest blush of shame, confess its excellence, though his own mind bleeds with the reflection, that, with equal, perhaps superior advantages, powers, and opportunities, the bloom of life was thrown away in idleness and folly, vice and wickedness, and in the pursuits of riot and dissipation, "amid the gay licentious crowd." Thus, in the end, he is miserably deceived in all his flattering expectations, and finds himself almost inexpressibly inferior in happiness to his envied and once, probably, despised rival.

"Know then this truth—enough for man to know—
Virtue alone is happiness below."

I am, Mr. Editor, your obedient admirer, VENATICUS.

DOGS—FAVOURITES.

For the Sporting Magazine.

MR. EDITOR,

If we look back into ancient history, we shall find the wisest and most celebrated nations of antiquity contending, as it were, with one another, which should pay the greatest honours to dogs. The old astronomers denominated stars after their names; and the Egyptians, in in particular, a wise and venerable people, worshipped a dog among the principal of their divinities. The poets represented Diana as spending a great part of her life among a pack of hounds, which I mention for the honour of the country gentlemen of Great Britain; and we know that the illustrious Theseus dedicated much of his time to the same companions.

Julius Pollux informs us, that the dying of purple and scarlet cloth was first found out by Hercules's dog roving along the sea-coast; and, accidentally eating of the shell-fish Murex, or Purpura, his lips became tinged with that colour; from whence the Tyrians first took the hint of the purple manufacture. To this lucky event, our fine gentlemen in the army are indebted for the scarlet with which they subdue the hearts of many fair ladies.

But nothing can give a more exalted idea of these illustrious animals, than to consider, that formerly, in ancient Greece, they gave name to a sect of philosophers, the members whereof were called Cynics—from κυνος, a dog—and were gloriously ambitious of assimilating themselves to the habits and manners of that animal from which they derived their title.

Such was the reverence paid to dogs among the nations of antiquity: and if we descend to later times, we shall not lack examples, even in our days and nation, of great men devoting themselves to dogs.

King Charles II. of pious and immortal memory, came always to the council-board accompanied by a favourite spaniel, who propagated his breed as extensively as his royal master *. His successor, King James, likewise was distinguished for the same attachment to these four-footed worthies. It is reported of him by Bishop Burnet, that being once in a dangerous storm at sea, and obliged to quit the ship in order to save his life, he vociferated, with impassioned accents, as his principal concern—"Save the Dogs, and Colonel Churchill!" I am, &c.

LYCOPHONTES.

A DESPERATE LEAP.

For the Sporting Magazine.

MR. EDITOR,

ALTHOUGH I have not before communicated any thing to the Sporting Magazine, I hope this former sterility of my pen will not induce you to reject the following circumstance, which happened under my own eyes one day the last hunting season.

The pack belonging to the Moreland Hunt turned off on the Wind Mill Common that day, in pursuit of a fine ferocious bag fox. The hounds pursued within a mile and a half of Leek, where their former impetuous and uninterrupted carreer was stopped by an unfortunate check. This difficulty was not surmounted for near a quarter of an hour; but as good luck at length would have it, the pack regained the true scent, and scoured the expanded plain before us with astonishing and renewed swiftness, buoyed up apparently with the animating conviction of revenging

* It is well known what a voluptuous court Charles II.'s was, and that this monarch spared no pains in curing women of that disease called Sterility.

themselves upon the insidious and crafty animal.

They swept along the champaign country for twelve miles, in fine style, till we came in sight of Ashbourn. Here the wily renard, wheeling round his course, directed his steps towards a ridge of wild hills on the left, distinguished with the appellation of Fairbourgh Cliffs. This chain of mountains is full of inequalities, loose paving stones, and treacherous hollows, so grown up with ling, as to deceive the most wary and penetrating eye. Guided by headlong fatality, the persecuted, hard-set fox, took refuge in this rugged spot. The indignant pack, with reverberating cries evincing their intrepidity, and careless of the perils that awaited them, quicken their steps, and enter the fateful desert. We hunters, regardless—and perhaps unconscious—of the calamities that were imminent, pushed on, and only fallaciously anticipated the future pleasures of the chase.

We had not advanced more than half a mile, before one horse broke his knee, by slipping into a cavity concealed by heath from the view; another slipped his shoulder by a fall; and, before the chase was finished, one gentleman, urged on by unexampled temerity, took a foolish leap on the hard and rigid rocks, by which he was overthrown, and broke his arm. The rest of us, however, pursued our course with more caution, and kept up with the hounds pretty well; not, however, without frequent hazards, and numerous stumbles.

At length renard, being hard pressed, and arriving at a steep precipice, where, if he turned back, he must inevitably have been caught, to our great surprise and astonishment, was reduced to such a state of desperation and perplexity, that he took the amazing leap, and precipitated himself to the bottom of the drear abyss. Many of the pack, impelled by inherent revenge and animosity, pursued his fatal example, before the huntsman could dispel the pernicious delusion by which they were actuated. More than thirty hounds, the best, most courageous, and fleetest of the pack, were dashed to pieces by the fall, and renard was found buried under a heap of his unfortunate enemies. NEW PUBLICATIONS.

AN Address to the Royal First Devon Yeomanry Cavalry, respecting the Management of their Horses, when employed in actual Service, &c. By James White, V. S. 82 pages, 8vo. Price 2s. 6d. Badcock. 1804.

After the method of cure of lameness caused by corns, as stated in our last, Mr. White next proceeds to lameness occasioned by nail-wounds; by ill-formed shoes; lameness from invisible causes; lameness from sprain in the back sinews; in the hock or stifle; and lameness from blows on the hip or shin-bone. After strongly recommending an application of Goulard's lotion, in the case of lameness occasioned by a stub or thorn, he concludes thus—"This plan is preferable to bleeding, which, though it may remove the complaint, is apt to create some degree of debility; and on all occasions it should be recollected, that the preservation of the horse's strength, during the contest we are likely to be be engaged in, is a matter of great consequence; and if we can remove a disease speedily, without taking from the animal more of the vital fluid than is absolutely necessary, we should by all means adopt that plan. Bleeding, in the horse, is one of the most important remedies we are acquainted with, and may be safely employed when he can be allowed time for the recovery of his strength; but, in actual service, the phleme, or lancet, must be used cautiously."

In this passage, there is a singular felicity of discrimination in the proper time for taking blood; and, in adverting to actual service, the author evinces a portion of genuine patriotism.

Wounds are now treated of, divided into sword-wounds, lacerated and contused, or gunshot wounds. We make no apology for extracting the entire section on lacerated wounds—

"Under this head we must comprehend wounds that are inflicted with blunt instruments; and where the divided parts are rather torn asunder than cut: in this case, we must never expect to heal the wound by the first intention. Inflammation, proportioned to the degree of the injury, will of course come on, and will be followed by suppuration. Our first and grand object, in this case, is to keep the inflammation within bounds; the remedies, therefore, will be fomentations, poultices, and digestives, with a gentle laxative and a bran diet; sometimes blue vitriol, that is, a solution of it, or a fine powder, is useful. But whenever such wounds are very deep and extensive, there is danger of gangrene or mortification *, which requires the use of antiseptic fomentations, composed of yeast or beer-grounds, and camphorated spirit. At the same time the horse must be supported by a generous diet, and tonic medicines; such as bark, opium, Port wine, ginger, &c. If, on such occasions, the horse refuses his food, let him be drenched with good water-gruel and strong wort, or infusion of malt. When the wound discharges a good white matter, and the flesh appears red, healthy, and full of small granulations, or new-formed flesh, digestives alone—such as the digestive ointment, or Friar's balsam—will be sufficient to complete the cure; but if this new or proud flesh is formed too luxuriantly, it must be kept under by proper remedies; such as red precipitate, lunar caustic, and pressure with a proper bandage: and on such occasions there should not be any kind of ointment used."

We confess ourselves highly pleased with this part of Mr. White's professional labour; and there can be no doubt he has done himself more honour, and the country full as much service, in this small treatise, as in his more elaborate System of Veterinary Medicine; the therapeutical part of which work will shortly pass under our review.

Meantime, we must not content ourselves with recommending this Address to Volunteer Cavalry merely—to them it is indispensible. The officers, and non-commissioned officers, of the line, should be furnished with a copy.

* The mortification which takes place on these occasions, is undoubtedly the effect of excessive inflammation: it is obvious, therefore, that our grand object, at first, is to moderate the inflammation, and prevent its becoming too high; for in all wounds a certain degree of inflammation is necessary to the cure.

The

The benefit resulting to regiments of horse, would be found second only to that which is derived from care and attention to the animal economy of the rider.

A CASSOCKED HUNTSMAN.

THE Rev. Ephraim Dandelion was a boyish divine, a cassocked huntsman, and a clerical buck. His visits to the metropolis were not so uninterrupted as he desired, owing to his father, an opulent rector, residing in the vicinity of ——, and also to the Bishop of that diocese, who, as he observed, was "a blockhead of the old school." Indeed, this Bishop was by no means a man of fashion; he bore a most religious antipathy towards all those young clergymen who were in full possession of a plurality of livings, and who escaped from them all to reside in the metropolis, and to dress their hair as they thought proper.

Ephraim was the hope of his family, because he was the eldest son; he had therefore been his father's favourite in his cradle; in which place the sacerdotal infant may be said to have felt a simoniacal propensity, for indeed simony was a constitutional vice in that family. There, by some ingenuity of his pious father, the Rector, he was inducted into two good advowsons, so that, ere the young gentleman issued from his pupillage, he presented himself to his own livings, and piously undertook the cure of the souls of several parishes. He was a young man of modest dispositions, and held in veneration the holy profession; and as he was at once a Nimrod in the field, and a Narcissus within doors, he decently procured two persons to perform his own duties. For this purpose, he found two fathers of large families, at the market-price of L.40 a year.

He was also a rigid observer of the utmost solemnity in the performance of all church services, and testified an uncommon zeal for ecclesiastical rights; the former consisted in the personal appearance of his curates; and whenever he heard the slightest complaint of a nasal twang, or a guttural digestion of words, or of a brownish black coat, such a curate was discharged at a week's notice; and his zeal for ecclesiastical rights was evidently exhibited in his seizure of all bands, black gloves, white favours, funeral scarfs, and the christening or marriage guinea. On the whole, he was a most orthodox supporter of the Church; understanding by this word a certain ancient building, encircled by burying-ground, and the interior furnished with a certain water-bason, vulgarly denominated the baptismal fount; burials and christenings, therefore, producing no inconsiderable income, he most zealously supported the aforesaid Church.

But although a sturdy advocate for church subordination, he could not consent to grant this to his Bishop. Too active in field sports during the summer, and quite exhausted in town dissipations during the winter, he most justly complained of the incessant and personal attacks of his said Bishop; who, particularly at one of his annual dinners given to his assembled brethren, did most indelicately reprimand our fashionable Rector, Vicar, and Prebendary; for all these honours and their appurtenances were united in young Ephraim.

He resolved now to throw off the yoke of ecclesiastical jurisdiction; and, to the great comfort of our sacerdotal bucks, they may enjoy the revenues of an ecclesiastic, without the borish performance of the functions.

Ephraim had great interest with a great man, for two reasons: in a drunken frolic at Brighton, he had received the honour of being thrown into a gravel pit, by which means he broke his leg; but as his neck was entire, he did not much lament the fracture, since it was a kind of claim on patronage; and the other reason was, that the Reverend Ephraim Dandelion was a person of inimitable talent, in imitating the bray of an ass, and the whine of a pig.

The ass and the pig, with the above-mentioned dash into the gravel-pit, procured him an honorary place in the army of Chaplains.

This honour brings with it the useful privilege of enabling the possessor to hold as many livings as he can get, while it comfortably relieves him of the tedious duty of residence; so the happy Ephraim, aspiring now to a Bishopric, he never more entered the palace of his Bishop.

Although we know of no facts that might tend to accuse him of any venial liberalities to his miserable curates, yet he was well enabled to commit such follies; for he now held, in livings and ceterus, above two thousand a year, according to his own frequent avowal, and little less he expected from the worthy Rector his father, who was of a most plethoric habit, was a Gargantua in point of stomach, one of the most orthodox venison eaters in his county, and had been twice touched by an apoplexy.

SINGULAR ADVENTURES IN THE ORKNEYS.

THE LEMMINGS, &c.

To the Editors of the Sporting Magazine.

GENTLEMEN,

IN the winter, I was obliged to undertake an unexpected journey to these islands, owing to some temporary embarrassment in my Norwegian concerns there, and from being apprized of the insidious views of my treacherous agent. During my sojourn in those islands, I met with some singular adventures, which I flatter myself are not entirely unconnected with the plan of your incomparable miscellany.

After a tempestuous passage over the Pentland Frith, I arrived in an island called Ranaldsha. I passed through this place without meeting with any thing extraordinary; but, as soon as I placed my foot upon the shores of Mainland, I was startled by a strange unaccountable din, accompanied by a full chorus of voices, proceeding, as I thought, from a multitude. I questioned my guide, the fisherman, who said, that he imagined some calamity must have befallen the inhabitants of the island, and that they were assembled for the purpose of deprecating the severity of their fate; he added, that they were then in the act of making atonement for their past offences, as was customary on such occasions.

On approaching nearer, I descried a crowd of the islanders employed in the most vehement gesticulations; some in supplicating postures, stretching their hands to the skies; others uttering the most impassioned ejaculations in barbarous ous accents; others again, with enthusiastic delirium, breaking out in frantic imprecations.

So strongly did the accumulated emotions of amazement and commiseration press upon my mind, that I was for a while deprived of the powers of speech and motion; but upon recovering from this conflict of contending passions, I was respectfully accosted by one who, far from having the infuriate and desponding aspect of the crowd, inspired veneration and regard: mild resignation, mixed with a degree of tender solicitude, sat enshrined on his aged countenance. He gave me the following account of the cause of this tumultuous scene of horror and distress—

"Yonder ridge of mountains is the seat of a republic of little animals, which we call ketlers—styled by naturalists, Lemmings—and are the greatest pests of our islands. In figure they are like a mouse, with a tail rather shorter; their hair is remarkable for softness and tenuity, and variously maculated.—This extraordinary animal pours down periodically from the mountains, and, like a conflagration, consumes every production of nature that falls in its way. This terrible calamity befel us, for the first time these twenty-three years, on the latter end of last autumn; and they rushed down in such astonishing numbers, that I will venture to say, they covered at least a mile square. In this migration, which happened after a series of long-continued rains, they moved in regular bodies, several millions in a troop, advancing by night, and halting by day.

"In vain did we, the wretched inhabitants, resist them, or attempt to check their progress; like an overflowing torrent, they carried all before them; wherever their motions were directed, nothing could impede them. They swam across rivers and ponds, and even climbed over houses, rather than deviate from the regular line of their march, and in their progress devoured every species of vegetable with which they met, leaving a wilderness of desolation behind them. Enemies so numerous and destructive, would soon have depopulated the whole island, had not the same voracity which prompted them to destroy the labours of industry, at last impelled them to prey upon each other.

"After having committed terrible devastations, they divided into two armies, and fought with deadly hatred and inveterate animosity. What became of the vanquished is unknown: it is probable that, having devoured every thing on their flight, they subsisted on each other; and being, in their whole migrations towards the sea, attended by larger rapacious animals, their ranks grew thinner, till they disappeared or expired. But the victors being intercepted in their retreat towards their native mountains, by an artifice of the islanders, by being pent up on all sides by large fires of wood and tar, died of hunger and fright. This stratagem, though it effectuated the destruction of the animals, was attended by terrible and unforeseen consequences; for their putrid carcases infected the circumambient air, and occasioned a most malignant and contagious distemper. The disease is now rapidly diffusing itself through this end of the island; and we are here assembled, with all the ministers, to avert the vengeance of an offended Deity, by expiations, and voluntary corporeal inflictions."

Such was the account which this venerable senior gave me, as we approached approached nearer this scene of unutterable woe.

I found in these expiatory operations, as gross superstitions and idolatries as were ever practised among the most unenlightened Pagans, or the most infatuated votaries of magic and divination. These necromancers—for I cannot distinguish them by a more deserved appellation—made use of a kind of tympanum, formed from the excavated trunk of a pine or fir, one end of which was covered with a skin. They draw on it, with a red slime, the effigies of their gods, as well as of Jesus Christ, the apostles, sun, moon, &c. On this they placed three brass rings, which, when the drum is beaten by a little hammer, dance over the figures; and, according to their progress, the sorcerer prognosticates the good or bad success of their supplications. Many of these votaries of superstition, exhausted by their violent fanatical extravagancies, and worn out by the malignity of their distemper, were lying stretched on the sand, in all the pangs of excruciating anguish; some of them had recently paid the debt to nature; the emaciated visages of the living were suffused with a morbid and feverish glow; and those of the dead wore a livid ghastliness, the features distorted by the hand of the king of terrors.

Among the personages who took a part in this dreadful tragedy, one interesting and heart-tearing group attracted my particular attention. I beheld a virgin, in the full bloom of youthful charms, indulging in all the ecstasy of grief, over the dead body of her aged father. Such beauty in distress could not fail to inspire me with sympathy and admiration. But what was my astonishment, what were my emotions, when in this female I recognised her on whom I had placed my youthful affections! I sprung forward with an involuntary impulse! She screamed with surprise at my appearance, and underwent such agitation as flushed every charm with irresistible energy: her cheeks glowed with the most delicate suffusion; her hair, already dishevelled by the transports of grief, hung in disorder on her ivory neck; and her bosom heaved with such bewitching undulations, that her robe—loosened in the agonies of sorrow—could not conceal or contain the snowy hemispheres, that rose, like a vision of paradise, to my view.

While she was almost fainting with unutterable woe, and ready to sink under the tumults of tenderness and confusion, I obeyed the impulse of my love, and, circling the charmer in my arms, carried her apart from this scene of sorrow, to a grassy mount at a distance.

Here, when the first emotions were over, she informed me, in a narration interrupted with sobs, and every indication of lively sorrow, that her father and herself, on their return from a journey to France and Holland, had been driven, by contrary tempestuous winds, on the Scottish coasts, and wrecked on this island in a storm; that, owing to the violence of the currents, they had not been able to leave the place; and that, during their detention there, her dear father had caught the contagious disease, and—died!

During this simple narrative, I could not repress the tumults of my swelling grief, but wept aloud; vowing that I would be her father, her protector, her—every thing.

After this, I conducted my weeping charge to my vessel, that she

she might be as far removed from the infection as possible; and then performed the funeral obsequies to the remains of her unfortunate father.

LAW.

ACTIONS FOR TRESPASS.

Carlisle Assizes.

BATEMAN v. BENSON.

THIS was an action of trespass brought by the Rev. Mr. Bateman against Mr. Benson, for killing game on the manor of Coat-hill and Cumwhinton.

Mr. Serjeant Cockell, for the plaintiff, said he would prove that Mr. Bateman was lord of the aforesaid manor, and consequently is entitled to have dominion over the soil, and is invested with power to prevent strangers from exercising any authority on these lands. This being the case, if a stranger not only usurps authority over the soil, but also kills game, he is doubly guilty. Mr. Benson has been very particular in preventing Mr. Bateman from shooting on his grounds; of course Mr. Bateman ought to have been left in the quiet possession of his own: but, contrary to this, after Mr. Benson was discharged, instead of discontinuing his evil practice, he said, "I don't care a straw for Mr. Bateman; I will sport here till all his fat partridges are killed." The Jury have only to find, according to the evidence brought before them, whether Mr. Benson has trespassed or not.

John Colthard, formerly a servant with Mr. Bateman, was out with his master in a field near Coat-hill, where they met Mr. Benson, carrying a gun, and accompanied by three dogs. Mr. Bateman reasoned with him concerning his conduct, and discharged him from coming there in future; notwithstanding this discharge, Mr. Benson continued his sport, and at this time shot a partridge. The boy knew the spot, and said it was on Mr. Bateman's ground. Witness carried a written discharge to Mr. Benson, which he treated with contempt.

On cross-examination, it appeared the young man could neither read nor write, and yet swore to Mr. Bateman's hand-writing.

Other witnesses were examined, who had seen the spot where the bird was killed, but could not say to a certainty whether it was on the property of Mr. Bateman or Mr. Rooke.

Mr. Park, on the part of the defendant, stated, that Mr. Benson had had as much reason to complain of the instructions given to his Learned Friend, as he has of the two impudent causes brought here. He says, the discharges were received by Mr. Benson with insolent contempt. "This could not be the case, as I shall prove they were received with silence. All that the witnesses for Mr. Bateman have proved amounts to this, that Mr. Benson killed a partridge, but whether it was on Mr. Bateman's or Mr. Rooke's estate, they could not tell. The Jury will be called upon to determine whether this trespass was on the manor of Coat-hill and Cumwhinton, or not?

whether Mr. Bateman is lord of that manor? and, lastly, whether the trespass was after the notice given?"

The Learned Judge, in summing up the evidence, said, it remained with the Jury whether or not they had any serious objection to the boy's evidence concerning the spot where the partridge was killed.

The Jury returned a verdict for the defendant.

BATEMAN v. BENSON.

THIS was another action brought by Mr. Bateman against Mr. Benson, for trespassing on his fields.

Mr. Serjeant Cockell, in opening the cause, on behalf of the plaintiff, animadverted upon the last verdict, and then reflected upon Mr. Park's severity on Mr. Bateman's conduct. He then observed, that Mr. Bateman, having heard from his servants, that Mr. Benson was continually trespassing on his estates, sent him a discharge on the 3d of September, 1803; Mr. Benson, not regarding this discharge, was found again trespassing on the 3d of December following; he at that time received another discharge by one of Mr. Bateman's tenants, and replied, "I neither regard you nor your master."

Robert Colthard knows Quarry Close, belonging to Mr. Bateman; saw Mr. Benson in it on the 3d of December last, with three dogs and a gun. Witness went up, and told him not to range there, as his master would not be pleased; Mr. Benson's answer was as stated above.

The Jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff—Damages, One Penny.

DANIEL MENDOZA, THE PUGILIST.

Surry Sessions, Sept. 5.

AT the above Sessions, held before Mr. Serjeant Onslow, and the Justices of the Peace for the county of Surry, for the purpose of discharging debtors, and hearing appeals under the late Insolvent Debtors' Act, Daniel Mendoza, a prisoner in the King's Bench—having given due notice, in the London Gazette, of his intention to take the benefit of the act—appeared in Court; but was opposed by Mr. Morris, on behalf of Messrs. Stothard, Hewson, and Co. brewers.

The Learned Counsel expressed his regret, that, although much as he admired the prisoner for his pugilistic science, yet he felt it his duty to oppose his liberation, however beneficial it might be to society, upon very serious grounds. The first was, that his schedule was defective, not having his last place of residence inserted; and the other, by much the more serious, was on the 40th clause, for removing his goods, with intent to defraud a fair creditor.

The circumstances were these—Mr. Mendoza, being very successful in his art, had won some considerable prizes; and, desiring to retire from any further contest, he represented his circumstances to Messrs. Stothard, Hewson, and Co. who were induced to set him up in the public line, at the sign of the Children in the Wood, in Whitechapel Road. This sign not being quite consonant with the ideas of Mr. Mendoza, he applied to the Magistrates, and was permitted to change it for that of the the Lord Nelson. Under this sign his success was very great; but unfortunately one of the partners of the brewery was not so attentive as he should have been to the conduct of Mendoza. The Lord Nelson was always at his post, only requiring such repairs as the weather has made necessary. Not so with Mendoza; instead of being always at the tap, as Lord Nelson was at the door, he was constantly frequenting his old sport of boxing-matches. But his clients had to complain of base ingratitude: they had set him up, and he had executed to them a warrant of attorney, thereby giving them a power over the property in the house. He suffered a large arrear of rent to accrue due, the payment of which he put off under various pretences, alleging, that there was always enough of furniture, plate, &c. in the house to satisfy it.—Upon these representations, they were induced to postpone serving any process for the rent; and at last, when they did proceed, the goods were all gone, and the rent remained unpaid.

George Pollard being sworn, stated, that he had received rent for Messrs. Stothard, Hewson, and Co. from Mendoza, for the Lord Nelson; that at the time he left it, in January, 1803, there was L.15 due for a half year's rent. A short time before, Mendoza shewed him a vast quantity of goods, consisting of plate, furniture, &c. He told him he was in the habit of entertaining bankers' sons, and other gentlemen, which obliged him to have all these accommodations for them: he told the witness that they were worth L.400.

Patrick Canden deposed, that he had levied the sum of L.12, 9s. upon the goods in question, but as Mendoza had been a brother officer, he had charged him no fees.

Mendoza was then examined. He declared, he never had any plate, except six tea-spoons; that which Pollard had seen, he had borrowed from neighbours. There was a great deal of furniture, mattresses, and beds, all of which had been sold by the brewers under their judgment; the only thing he had retained for himself, his wife, and seven children, was a mattress and flock bed. He owed his brother-in-law a large sum of money, which he levied on the goods previous to the brewers, and he had never been at his house after he first left it.

He was then asked, had he not received L.50 since he went to prison? He answered, he had.

Q. What have you done with it?

A. Ask my children.

He was then remanded, till he should amend his schedule as to his last place of residence.

INGRESS AND MIGRATION OF SNIPES.

A SOCIETY of Sportsmen, in the county of Norfolk have agreed to devote much attention to ascertain in what degree snipes are migratory, and at what periods they depart from and return to this country.

It is known, that a considerable number of these birds are bred upon the moors, heaths, and fens, of Norfolk and Suffolk; but no data are yet established to prove that this race alone is sufficient to account for the very abundant appearance of snipes upon almost all the marshes, from the present time till

till the end of October, when they disappear, till the end of February.

It appears that the projects of this Society, whose object seems to be to establish a complete Natural History of the Snipe, will be conducted upon a very extensive scale, as they mean to have correspondents upon the coast, to watch for the ingress and migration of these singular birds: while others are to be established on the small and rapid streams of the county, and in the vicinity of the extensive fens, where they are known to harbour.

As the times of their migration are known to be synchronous with occurrences in the kingdoms of naturalists, these agents are to take notice when their appearance or disappearance coincides with any fact observable in the animal or vegetable kingdoms: though these coincidences can only be confirmed by the observations of several years.

THEATRICALS.

THE GAY DECEIVERS.

Colman's Theatre.

THIS new After-piece, written by Mr. Colman, was presented, for the first time, on Wednesday night, August 22. Prefixed to the book of the Songs was the following ADVERTISEMENT.

"An opera, produced some years ago, in Paris, under the title of Les Evenemens Imprevus has furnished a mere hint for the Farce in which the following Songs are contained.

"The marked favour and indulgence which 'The Review,' and 'Love Laughs at Locksmiths,' have experienced, induce the author to hope that he may again unbend the gravity of judgment with his 'Gay Deceivers.'—'Tis all he wishes—A scribbler who can gain no laurels by success, has none to be withered by failure.

SCENE—Twickenham.

The following is the outline of the story—

Mr. Candy, a sugar-baker in the city, had retired from business, with an only daughter, who was of course heiress to his fortune, which was considerable. Miss Candy has two suitors, Mr. Welworth and Sir

* A name assumed by Mr. Colman.

Harry

Harry Popinjay: the former a worthy gentleman and modest man, but secretly favoured by the father; the latter a conceited fop of the New School, and twin-brother to the Honourable Tom Shuffleton. Sir Harry Popinjay had been obliged to leave London on account of his creditors; and, for the sake of accomplishing his wishes in the country, had for some time assumed the name of Welworth, while his servant, adopting the deception of his master, had also assumed the name of the servant of the real Mr. Welworth, viz. Nehemia Flam, a fellow who had, after serving in various capacities, such as a shewman, a keeper of wild beasts, and a shoe-black, at last turned Quaker, upon being left an annuity by an old uncle, who was one of the faithful. Sir Harry had here become acquainted with a widow, who followed him to Mr. Candy's. He had persuaded Mr. Candy that his daughter had given her consent to their marriage, but the father being doubtful, the young Lady is consulted, and declares for Mr. Welworth. He, in the mean time, sends a letter to the false Mr. Welworth, upbraiding him with his falsehood, and this occasions some confusion, till Mrs. Flaw arrives, and seizes upon Sir Harry, when the piece ends with the marriage of Emily Candy and Welworth.

We have neither inclination nor room to enter into a long discussion of the merits or demerits of the piece. Suffice it to say, that it was pregnant with the pleasantries suitable to a farce, and was very admirably acted. It is extremely well calculated to beguile a leisure hour; and has many more of the essential qualities of an Entertainment than some of those that are unaccountably popular. If it has not the excellencies of some of the author's best performances, the fastidious critic cannot call it the vehicle of disgraceful insipidity or shameful dulness. It is lively throughout; and although the whole hangs on a very slender thread, yet it is so full of mirth-provoking qualities as to become a favourite. The ingenious author, to whom the public is much indebted for some of its best and most rational amusements, is certainly entitled to every indulgence; and we have no doubt, but that after a fair hearing, it will enrich the treasury of the theatre.

To Mr. Bannister, Mr. Mathews, and Mrs Gibbs, the author ought to return his best thanks; and while praise is bestowed on the meritorious, let him not forget that very excellent actor Mr. Elliston.

Just at the close of the piece, on the first night of representation, a very violent and very illiberal opposition arose, when Mr. Elliston, with a spirit, a promptitude, and friendship, which cannot be too highly extolled, with great difficulty obtained a hearing, and addressed the audience nearly as follows—

"Ladies and Gentlemen,

"Permit me to assure you, that it is neither my wish, nor that of the author, to obtrude upon the audience any thing against its will or approbation (Loud plaudits.)—I would be the very last person in the world to support such a measure, if it were attempted.—But I beg leave to be heard—this audience has never before refused to hear me—and I am sure it will not deny me that favour on this occasion—(Loud applause from all parts of the House.)—I speak sincerely, from the impulse of the moment, and without any previous preparation—(Plaudits.)—Allow me, therefore simply to state, in justice to the author, my friendship for for whom can only end with my life—(Here Mr. Elliston placed his right hand emphatically on his heart)—That this piece has been gotten up in a very great hurry, and this, in some respects, may have concealed its merits on a first representation. I am, therefore, warranted in saying, that neither the piece nor the author has experienced that justice to which the merits of both entitle them. Believing, from the evident disposition of the audience, that there is a respectable majority in favour of another hearing of this piece, shall I request your consent?"

This question was followed by loud and reiterated plaudits from all parts of the House, when Mr. Elliston respectfully bowed and retired.

The overture and music, composed and selected by Mr. Kelly, has much merit.

There is a very admirable painting of Pope's house and lawn, &c. fronting the Thames.

THORNTON'S SPORTING TOUR.

JULY 10.—Proceeded for Raits. The kettle containing the fish having been found inconvenient in splashing at every jolt of the vehicle which was found unavoidable, endeavoured to obtain assistance to take it the next stage of ten miles on foot. The proposition was made to several peasants, who demanded no less than eight days wages, according to the pay of the country: four days wages were offered but refused—an instance of Caledonian moderation with a witness! Reached Dalwhinny; dined; and after dinner proceeded for Raits, where all were very anxious to arrive for the sake of a settled abode after so much travelling.—Horses remarkably fresh, though they had already come twenty-four miles over very steep roads. Could not avoid stopping a few moments upon the road, to admire the falls of Truem, and got to Pitmain, which is thirteen miles from Dalwhinny, in fifty-nine minutes. From the last-mentioned place, a soldier had been given half a-crown to come on with the fish to Raits, and was ordered to refresh the perch with fresh water at every brook he came near in his way. This, however, he very kindly and complacently neglected to do, and the fish were found all dead upon the arrival of so trusty a dependent.

July 12.--Examined the dogs after their sea-bathing; found all fresh and vigorous. Killed two brace of ducks, and a brace and a half of snipes before breakfast; but bruised the tendo Achilles by a hard seam in the fen-boots, and was obliged to hobble home an invalid.

Just as the land apparatus was all unpacked, a dismal account of the voyagers was received. It seems that the cutter the Colonel had engaged was deeply laden with stores, &c. but sailed very safely to Hull, where flour, corn, beans, biscuits, oat-meal, and other articles, were properly stowed; and they again set sail with a promising wind.

About two in the morning, when upon the main ocean, the housekeeper was alarmed with the unpleasant sensation of the trickling of water in her cot; but not conscious of the cause, was waiting anxiously for the event, when a similar milar occurrence having happened in another cot, an alarm was given, and the crew were not long in discovering a leak had taken place. The servants with one voice bitterly inveighed against the expedition, and swore they would gladly relinquish their whole year's wages to be again safe on terra firma. The pumps were instantly at work, and male and female used every endeavour to free the hold; but they found no efforts whatever could reduce the water, which appeared rather to gain upon them than diminish, and they very justly conceived, that should the weather become unfavourable, they must all inevitably perish. Part of the little crew, with hasty epithets, blamed the Captain for having brought them out in so crazy a vessel; others fell to prayers; however, at day-break, the leak was fortunately discovered, and with difficulty so far stopped, that one hand working every other hour, kept the hold tolerably dry. When considered tolerably safe, the pump, not being made of the best materials, soon became in a manner useless, and the water once more gained upon them. In this dreadful dilemma, they saw a vessel with crowded canvass, on the same tack, and coming near her, they did not fail to make what signs of distress they could: nor was Mrs. C. deficient; for, having hoisted what white linen she could procure on the oar of the little jolly boat, they perceived the vessel bear up to them, which proved to be a smack bound for Whitby. The master of her lending them the assistance of two hands, and taking charge of the female, kept near the cutter, and at length got them safe into the harbour, where they unanimously took care that the vessel should undergo a thorough repair; this operation took up two days, when they again sailed, and were soon safely landed at Forres.

The next concern was to procure carts to convey the cargo; and so little do these people carry in their small carriages, that it took no less than forty-nine in number, independent of the boats, which were left to the care of the captain, who pleased himself by having invented a kind of sledge, which, with four horses, might transport the two boats over the mountains to Raits; and they were to be forwarded so soon as the horses already employed were returned. At Raits, a few successive days were employed alternately in fishing and shooting; the returns, five brace and a half of ducks, a brace of snipes, and a plover; twenty-two trout, chiefly from four to five pounds, with the trimmers, one eel; and a large pike.

July 15.—Visited by Doctor Grant and the Rev. Mr. Robert M'Pherson. In the evening, received a cast of hawks and a tercel, as a present from Lochaber, to the colonel's great joy, having despaired of procuring any.

The next day, Mr. Whitaker shot, while Captain Waller and the colonel trolled down the river; hooked an enormous salmon, who became the victor; for, after half an hour's hard labour, he broke the line, rod, and wheel, beating the colonel at a canter: the produce of the day, nevertheless, was one pike, and seven large trout; and by the gun, eight ducks, and three plovers. Following day, nine wild ducks, three snipes, and two plovers: and the next, seven snipes, with the gun; and one hundred and one trout, with the nets.

Mr. W. who was going to leave them, having expressed a great desire to see and get a shot at a roebuck, before his departure, a trick was played upon him, by ordering a goat a goat to be procured, as near the colour of the roebuck as possible, which, being placed in a certain part of the covert intended to be beat, was roused in such a manner as afforded Mr. W. an opportunity to shoot at it as a roebuck; when the whole party, who were near him, were in the secret, that his game was only a goat.

July 20.—A formal examination and report made of all the provisions, stores, hawks, setters, pointers, guns, powder, &c. &c. and two waggons ordered off to Inverness, the nearest market town, at forty-two miles distance, for oatmeal, corn, groceries, wines, and other household necessaries. Here follows a frivolous diary of trifles, without matter either to inform or entertain; a mere repetition of the same thing, eating, drinking, fishing, shooting, and sleeping, without the least variety.

On the 29th, fished Loch Alva, killed a pike of above fourteen pounds weight; and on the following day another, five feet four inches, from eye to fork, and nearly forty-eight pounds in weight by the scale. When opened, he had part of another within him, not yet digested.

At this part of the tour, the reader has to encounter a long succession of pages, without a single line, or occurrence, to lay claim to the slightest attention, except traversing the mountains, and sailing upon the lakes, in the midst of which is introduced a print of Loch Enoch. Gave orders for one of the baggage waggons to proceed with the necessary apparatus to Avemore, and there remain for farther instructions Intending to pass three days encampment in the neighbourhood of Loch Baugh, necessaries were ordered to be packed up accordingly. The rides between Raits and Avemore delightful, the road pleasing, and differing from all the Highland ones; not in the least hilly, but what declivities there are, mostly gentle slopes. On the right are immense hills; and in the centre of the vale runs the noble, winding, rapid Spey, having innumerable coppices of birch on its banks. The opposite hills are covered, almost to the very skies, with immense forests of fir, and Glenmore and Rothiemurchus woods—about seven or eight miles broad, and twelve or fourteen long—give a melancholy shade to the pearl-coloured mountains around them.

The forest formed by Glenmore and Rothiemurchus produces noble firs, and is an asylum for stags and roebucks; in it are also some eyries of goss-hawks, many of which were seen. The inn at Avemore but indifferent: Mr. M'Gregor, the landlord, civil, attentive, and agreeable, anxious to please and give satisfaction to all his guests: the provisions too were tolerable; mutton particularly good, the cheese and claret incomparable!!!

A long succession of dull and dreary pages follow, replete with an uninteresting recital of the most puerile occurrences, without a single anecdote to gratify curiosity, or to excite a smile; till Lawson, a favourite servant of the Colonel's, was very nearly drowned by swimming his horse to assist in taking and bringing to shore a pike of much magnitude. Of this the Colonel gives the following account—that seeing him disengaged from the horse, and sinking, he threw himself into the water, and soon got near him; when he rose to the surface a second time, the Colonel threw a Highland plaid over him; but he was too weak, or too much terrified, to take the least hold of it. The Colonel, after various rious struggling, and repeated exertions, vociferating loudly, to rouse him from his seeming stupor, had the consolation to see him make an attempt at the plaid, though he missed his aim, and sunk again immediately, with much struggling and evident weakness. The next effort with the plaid succeeded, though the hold was so slight that it occasioned a few moments of the most dreadful anxiety; by perseverance the Colonel got him nearer, and at length got hold of him; and, sometimes swimming, scrambling, and wading, dragged him ashore, quite exhausted, but in a little time he recovered apace; one instant more would have decided his fate. The horse, as soon as he had dismounted his rider, swam out, and went full tilt to the encampment, without a saddle; and the attendants there, seeing him in such a wet and doleful plight, could not conceive what had been the matter.

In verification of the old maxim, that "Misfortunes never come alone," one of the local attendants, an honest highlander, eloped with the Colonel's superb fishing rod, which cost him six guineas; and this was never recovered. In varied situations, shooting, hawking, and fishing, carried on with little or no interruption, as usual, till caught about noon in one continued storm, the Colonel luckily got into a bothee or sheelin, which is a cottage made of turf, the dairy house, where the highland shepherds or graziers live with their herds and flocks; and during the fine season, make butter and cheese, gather juniper-berries, which in parts of the highlands abound, and sell for a good price. Their whole furniture consists of a few horn spoons, their milking utensils, a couch formed of sods to lie on, and a rug to cover them. Their food, oat cakes, butter, or cheese, and often the coagulated blood of their cattle spread on their bannocks: their drink, milk or whey, and sometimes, by way of indulgence, whiskey. Such dairy houses are common to most mountainous countries; those in Wales are called hafodtai, or summer-houses; those in the Swiss Alps, sennes. Here, the old lady, adding some faggots of dry juniper, all got as dry and as comfortable as the lodging and hostess—perfectly ignorant of any language but Erse—could make them. The landlady appeared to be of the wrong side of forty-five, much weezened and dried by the smoke, but had a cheerful countenance, and, as is usual with most ladies, a prodigious desire of conversing; which was, for the reasons already given, totally prevented. At length, an itinerant soldier, discharged from the fencibles, and driven from the wild moors by the weather, came in and acted as interpreter; and by him the Colonel made his proposals to become the lady's guest for the evening, it being now past five, and continued a dreadful rain. No encampment to be seen; eight Highland miles home; in the very heart of game; powder well prepared and dried; shot sufficient for a day's sport; dogs well fed with two cheeses and a large bowl of milk—Could there, to a sportsman, be any better measure adopted?

Materials arrive. Camp formed; the next day, August 25, all hands were at work; the pioneers and camp-colourmen were very alert, and the whole party soon snug under canvass. Dinner announced at eight o'clock, consisting of a hodge-podge — Remove — Boiled trout and salmon; rein deer's tongue; cold fowl; brandered moor-game; sauces; garlick, and capsicum vinegars. — Remove.— Cheshire cheese; moor-game gizzards;

zards; biscuits; port; imperial Jamaica rum punch, with limes, porter, and ale. Sporting returns, one salmon, twenty-three trout, seventeen moor-game. Next day, forty-one moor-game, two snipes, and thirty-nine trout. Shot, standing at the tent door, two old moor-cocks. Hawking, the day following, killed four brace and a half; and caught twenty-seven trout. Country round, mountains on one side, and gently rising moors on the other; but so dry, that the most timorous London miss, just turned out an accomplished horsewoman from Emmerson, might ride with pleasure; and where Churchill's satire, in the following lines, would have been truth itself—

> "Far as the eye could reach, no tree was seen,
> "Earth clad in russet, scorn'd the lively green."

The game on these moors innumerable; in a mile long, and not half a one broad, saw at least one thousand brace of birds. Two miles on the left, got a partial peep at the beautiful forest of Dulnon, in which are plenty of stags and roebucks, also plenty of black game on its edges. Shot two moor-game. Hawks, killed nine; and trout, in fishing, twenty-seven. Next day, Dr. M'Pherson killed fifty-seven fine trout, fishing with a fly; and in the evening, the doctor, with a net seventy-nine yards long and twelve deep, produced no less than two hundred and seventeen, but not one exceeding five pounds in weight. A great number of pages now follow, replete with the most frivolous insipidity; not a line with novelty or entertainment to excite the attention of a schoolboy.

September commences, with a profusion of shooting, and an equal profusion of bad weather. Eight neighbouring gentlemen came to sup at the camp. Killed, the next day, with the gun, forty-two birds; the hawks, nine. Repetition upon repetition of fishing, shooting, and incessant gormandization till September 13. Introduced to Captain J. M'Pherson's family, and also to a Miss Anna M'P. a healthy, pleasant girl; her hair, which was of the colour of silver, the Colonel thought without a parallel—a most sublime discovery!!! Here is introduced a well executed print of Loch Eunich.

September 14.—Fortunate day, killed six pike, seventeen trout; shot four black cocks, nine partridges, and three snipes. The next day, in shooting, met with a severe fall near the edge of a precipice, by the side of a most beautiful water-fall, which the Colonel's companions were pleased to commemorate, by naming the spot, "The falls of Thornton." The Laird of Sheene, and Captain J. M'Pherson, dined at the camp—dinner described—much as before. Saw two very large eagles on the edge of Croke Franc. Long and uninteresting pages follow, of eating, drinking, sleeping, and fishing, without an anecdote to please, or a passage to entertain. In fishing Lawson's Gulph, killed a pike of twenty pounds weight, and four more from five to nine pounds each. Supped at Kingcraig; got introduced to the Laird of M'Intosh, and the Laird of Dalmaguiy; likewise, father of the handsome Miss A. M'P. with the silver hair.

Plan laid to visit Gordon Castle, intending to go in pursuit of roebucks at Glenmore and Rothiemurchus, having sent to Mr. Stewart, the D. of Gordon's head forester, to meet him there.

FEAST

FEAST OF WIT; OR, SPORTSMAN's HALL.

JOE MILLER PETER PINDARISED.

A LONDON Jockey, well known for a fool,
Whose saddle might be aptly styl'd a mule,
Since when he rode, it ever came to pass,
That 'twas a something 'twixt a horse and ass;
Once left the town,
And as most travellers will,
Went often down,
And often up a hill:
At length a steep of fearful height
Struck our horseman's wond'ring sight;
But what did most alarm him now,
Was, that at bottom seem'd a slough.
Doubtful he stood,
In thoughtful mood,
When hard by in a brake
A clown he spied, and thus bespake:
"Is bottom hard of yonder place?"
"Hard, mon?" the clown replied,
"Aye, that it is!"
With nimble pace he then descended,
And up to boots in mud his journey ended.
Swearing at clowns, he storm'd and rag'd his fill,
And wish'd with all his heart the devil had got 'em;
When out he bawl'd to him upon the hill—
"Did you not, rascal, say 'twas hard at bottom?"
The clown rejoin'd, with broadest grin,
Which he conceiv'd no mortal sin—
"And sa it be, I'll maak ye ony bet,
But yow's not half-ways to the bottom yet!"

MR. MARSHALL, now a Judge of the United States, when a barrister, coming heated out of Court, saw a coach at the door with the motto—"Non nobis solum—Not for ourselves alone."—"Is it so?" said Mr. M. "then, coachman, drive me to my lodging." This was done, the owner was not offended, and the motto remains unchanged.

SINGULAR Mistake.—A curious circumstance lately happened at Glasgow—As Lord Eardly passed through that place on his tour to the Highlands, he wanted some clothes made, and ordered the waiter, at the Star Inn, to send for the principal tailor. The man, with the best intentions, instantly dispatched a message to the Rev. Principal Taylor, of Glasgow College, who soon afterwards appeared, when the eclaircissement with his Lordship was truly ludicrous.

THE fulsome nonsense addressed to the cast-off mistress of Barras, the new mock Empress, cannot but remind the English reader of the address of the Coventry Corporation to Queen Elizabeth, and her reply.—A grand processsion met the the Queen, when Mr. Recorder, with all due solemnity, said—

We men of Coventry
Are very glad to see
Your Royal Majesty.
Good Lord, how fair you be!

The answer was equally laconic, and more ingenuous—

My Royal Majesty
Is very glad to see
You men of Coventry,
Good Lord, what fools you be!

One of Sir Francis Burdett's friends being asked his opinion of the conduct of the Sheriff in the late election, exclaimed, P*shaw!*

An Irish soldier, who came over with General Moore, being asked if he met with much hospitality in Holland—"O yes," replied he, "I was in the hospital almost all the time I was there."

One of the Daily Papers mentions the falling down of an empty house, and gravely states that none of its inhabitants were killed.

It was said of a celebrated son of Thespis, now dead, not remarkable for fulfilling his engagements very punctually, either with the manager or the public—that he promised well, but turned out a very bad performer.

An Irish bookseller has just advertised, that he has plenty of scarce books on sale.

The question was lately agitated in a large company—What would amount to a competency in these times!—One gentlemen said, that he should be satisfied with a house, a field, and a garden. His moderation had much praise, until his objects were more fully disclosed—they were, the Custom-house, Smith-field, and Covent-garden!

A punning correspondent says, that Mr. Cherry and Miss Mellon being retained at Drury-lane Theatre, the managers evidently look to a fruitful season.

The old Nurse's Meditation upon the dead Alderman, a Fragment—

——"So saying, she turned down the sheet which was upon the corpse, and patting its belly with her hand, "This, I warrant you," continued the old dame, "has held as many bottles of wine in its time as ever a celler in the city!—well, poor Mr. Alderman Paunch! God rest his soul—he was a good creature! he never grudged the poor, what he didn't love himself. Oh! those poor, pale lips!—where's all the chickens, and all the capons, and all the ducks, and all the turkeys, and all the pullets, and all the fowls, and all the game, and all the hams, and all the chines, and all the haunches of venison, and all the turbot, and all the salmon, and all the fish, and the beef, and the turtle, and the marrow-puddings, and the pies, and the custards, and all the dainties it has cost the City so much money for?"

Bon Mot.—A Sir John Brute, telling his Lady, a few days since, that the invasion would be attended with surprising effects, she significantly replied—"on surly husbands, I hope."

A German writer has announced, that he is ready to furnish Epigrams for Wits—Madrigals for Lovers—and Essays for speculative Politicians.—Impromptus, it is added, may be had, on giving a month's notice.

SPORTING

SPORTING INTELLIGENCE.

THE first of September, Thomas Ashton Smith, Esq. jun. shot, on his manor, at Sutton Scotney, Hants, thirty brace of very fair birds: the first 35 birds were killed at 37 single shots.

MR. Coke had three parties out at Holkham, in Norfolk, mounting twelve guns: the return, by three o'clock that day, was 95 brace of partridges, 18 brace of hares, and 47 couple of rabbits. Mr. Coke killed a full third of the whole, from his own double-barreled gun.

NOTWITHSTANDING the scarcity of game on the moors in Lancashire, Lord Viscount Lowther, with the Earl of Westmorland and his party, have been very successful this season. The latter nobleman killed 25 birds at 26 shots, the first day, on Shapfells.

IN some parts of Yorkshire, the broods of moor game have been, this season, very large and numerous. Upwards of 250 brace have been shot on the Swaledalemoors, by Mr. Denys, jun. and the game keeper, with single-barreled guns.

DURING the present month, a cock partridge was killed on the How Farm, Hambleden, Bucks, by Mr. Fortnam of Henley, which weighed twenty ounces and a half; its girt, across the breast, was 12 inches and a half. Instances are very rare where a partridge, in this country, has been found to weigh a pound.

AN extraordinary lusus naturæ, of the feathered kind, was found in a partridge, killed by the Rev. Mr. B. Dudley's keeper, in Essex; half the feathers—the largest—in each wing of this bird being milk white, and the skin of the central claw of both feet being of the same colour.

MR. Coventry's celebrated horse Lumbago, has been running with his usual success in the West of England. Mr. C. has been offered 700 guineas for that favourite racer.

Two remarkably large asses were lately landed at Portsmouth, from Malta, a present from Sir Alexander Ball to Sir Isaac Coffin and Admiral Aylmer.

THE fashionable pedestrian, Mr. Methuen, has at length made the great exertion of his powers. Mr. Foley was at the head of those who betted, at least L.2000, that Mr. M. was not equal to the following efforts, viz.

To walk 10 miles in 2 hours.
To walk 20 miles in 4 hours.
To walk 150 miles in 3 days.

The first was performed on Sunday morning the 16th instant, with ease, by Mr. M. in eight minutes less than the time prescribed.

THE match between Mr. Barclay and Capt. Marston, of the 48th regiment, to run one mile for 100 guineas, was performed on the 18th instant, at Eastbourne in Sussex. The

The gentlemen were both such celebrated pedestrians, that the race attracted some hundreds of spectators: a great deal of money was also sported; and as Capt. Marston was known, by the regiment, to be a swift runner, he found many to back him. The two gentlemen started at an early hour. Mr. Barclay suffered his competitor to take the lead, and keep it for a short distance, when he passed him, and continued a-head to the end of the race. He completed the distance in five minutes and seven seconds, notwithstanding the intense heat of the weather. Mr. Barclay was under training for some time by Bill Ward. Mr. Fletcher Reed attended as umpire.

On Tuesday morning the 18th inst. a butcher in Whitechapel, for a wager of 17 guineas, being all he had, engaged to go 60 miles in 12 hours on foot. He started from Whitechapel turnpike, walked 30 miles, and back again to the starting place. He performed the journey in three quarters of an hour less than the time allowed. Several hundreds were sported on the occasion.

During the present month Mr. Bruce Knight, undertook for a wager of considerable amount, to walk from Cardiff to Brecon, and back to Cardiff, a distance of 86 miles, in 40 hours, which he performed with ease in 33 hours.

Coursing.—The match betwixt Suwarrow and Pizarro over the Marlborough Downs, is off by consent.

Friday morning, September 16, a grey mare, the property of Mr. Stevens, of Godmanchester, trotted 15 miles on the road between Cambridge and Huntingdon, in 56 minutes, carrying 13½st.

A mare, the property of a butcher in St. James's market, whose employment is drawing the blood cart, was on Monday the 17th inst. matched against time, to trot 13 miles within the hour, on the Bath road, for 25 guineas. The meagre appearance of the poor beast was so much against her, that two to one were the odds. At starting she went so lame, that odds were taken that she did not perform ten miles in the given time. The ground over which she trotted was, from the 8th to the 15th mile stone, and to return to the 9th mile stone. The knowing ones were taken in, as well as surprised at the sight of the animal, at the starting place, in seven minutes less than the time proposed.

Rowing Match.—Monday, September 24, a wager for a considerable sum of money was determined, between Cannons, a waterman at King's-stairs, and Church, at Limehouse-hole. The distance was from the Sand-wharf at Woolwich, to the Horse-ferry, Rotherhithe. The odds at starting were greatly in favour of Church, who, however, just as they got to Blackwall, found himself so weak, that he gave in the wager. Considerable sums of money were depending on the issue of the contest, and the knowing ones were taken in.

Ever since Caleb Baldwin, the pugilistic veteran, was vanquished by Dutch Sam, he has continually evinced a desire to try his fortune once more with that formidable opponent; assigning, as a reason for having lost the former battle that he was much out of health. The beginning of this month he accordingly matched himself to fight Sam on a given day, for 20 guineas, and a part of that sum was put down to bind the bargain; but, to the great surprise, as well as disappointment ment of many of the amateurs, Dutch Sam forfeited the stake. It is, however, expected the engagement will shortly be renewed.

On Monday, Aug. 27, a Match of Cricket was played at Maldon, between eleven married and eleven single gentlemen of that town, which, after an agreeable contest, terminated in favour of the former. And, on the following day, a grand match was played at the same place, between eleven of the Royal Surry Millitia, patronised by Lord Cranley, and eleven gentlemen of Maldon, Essex, which, after a like contest, wherein great science in that manly exercise was displayed on both sides, terminated as under—Surry, 1st and 2d innings, 134; Maldon, 1st and 2d innings, 140, and five wickets to go down.

A singular incident in the animal economy occurred on Saturday the 8th instant, at Updown, near Deal—A hare, after being coursed by the dogs, was caught and killed: in paunching it, two leverets were found alive, which being taken to a cat that had lately kittened, became so attached to their new mother, that they eagerly sought and sucked her, and who also, having been deprived of her kittens, caressed them with equal fondness as those of her own offspring.

It is an undoubted fact, but which will hardly be believed, that a hare was shot, a few days ago, at Banstead, in Surry, by Thomas Bartley, keeper to J. Judson, Esq. Tedworth House, which, on opening, was found to contain four young ones, all alive. The circumstance appearing so extraordinary to the keeper, he wrapped them up in a silk handkerchief, put them into his bosom, and carried them home to his wife, who determined to do all she could to preserve them. Accordingly, she warmed some milk, and gave it them. One of the little animals died, but the other three are likely to live.

Pontefract Meeting.—In the first heat, on the last day, between Sir Peter's filly, Stretch, and Auctioneer, when within a few lengths, Auctioneer's rider's leg was caught by a person on foot, which pulled him of. In running for the second heat, within a few lengths of the winning-post, Mr. Wardell's filly had the lead about a length, when the rider struck her severely, which made her swerve and take Auctioneer's ground; the latter went over the rails and fell, and crushed the boy in such a manner that he was taken up speechless. Mr. Mellish humanely took him in his carriage to Pontefract. Mr. Wardell's rider, in preventing his filly from likewise going over the rails, threw her down; but fortunately neither her nor the boy received any injury. The Judge thought it was a cross; but being submitted to arbitration by the Stewards—Lord Galway and Mr. Kaye—they named Lord Darlington, Mr. Wilson, and Mr. Lee, who, after questioning J. Jackson, who rode Stretch, the plate was given to Mr. Wardell. The railing is intended to be taken down, and several other improvements made on the Course.

Poney Races.—On Monday, the 27th ult. the Poney Races commenced on the New Course, marked out opposite Mr. Durant's house, Woodcot Lodge, near Carshalton. Mr. Durant, unfortunately, could not attend the starting on Monday, and a considerable delay took place in consequence. The poneys that were to have started at two o'clock, were not ready till half past four, at which time four started for the sweepstakes. The bets were seven to one one at starting, in favour of a grey; but, on their running the course once round, the chance turned in favour of Lord Gray's brown; the grey, however, got the sweepstakes by near four yards. One of the poneys was thrown out.—The second race was for a capital saddle and bridle, which was very warmly contested.—A wager was run for, between the butcher's poney which had been so successful at Godstone, and one of Lord Gray's, which afforded considerable sport.

The day being very favourable, all the fashionables in the county were collected at an early hour. We observed among them Lord Gray, Admiral Pigot, and many of the first characters in the sporting line.

THE Races at Watford were never better attended than they were on Friday and Saturday, the 18th and 19th inst. Upwards of 4000 were present, in which were a number of persons of distinction. Among them we noticed Lord Clarendon, the Hon. Mr. Villiers, Sir Thomas Thompson, Col. O'Kelly, Mr. Woodham, and Mr. Sturges.

On Friday, a silver cup, value L.60 was run for on Bushy Meadow, by seven galloways, in three mile heats. Only five continued the contest; one met with a severe accident, in spraining his ancle, and the other gave up the contest. Mr. Cartwright's proved the victor, which was bred by Lord Clarendon, and his Lordship said, he never saw a better race at Newmarket.

In the afternoon, a L.40 bowl was run for by five poneys. At starting, it was discovered that a grey poney was rather too high for a poney, when the cruel mode of reducing height was resorted to, of contracting his sinews to make him short enough.

On Saturday a race for L.50 was run for by Mr. Sturges's horse and Mr. Woodham's grey mare, which was won by the latter.

A race between Mr. Hanshaw's poney and two others. It was a very hard race; Mr. H.'s poney only won it by half a neck. This poney has only one eye.

Mr. Sturges's horse, and Mr. Woodham's grey mare, ran again for L.50, which, after a very hard run, was won by the latter.

The beautiful Mrs. Sturges drove over the course several times in an elegant curricle, and a pair of fine horses.

Colonel O'Kelly has offered a plate of L.50 for next year's races.

CAUTION to Game-keepers and others firing with Ball.—On Monday, between the hours of seven and eight o'clock, as the Reverend J. Hayward, Rector of Avington, Hants, was walking upon his glebe, a rifle gun was fired from the park (to which the glebe is contiguous) by H. Sawkins, one of the game-keepers. The ball passed within about two paces of Mr. Hayward's breast, cutting off several ears of wheat from a crop which he was inspecting.

A FEW days ago, a young whale, about fifty feet in length, was driven upon Trinity Sand, at the mouth of the Humber; it is since taken into Grimsby.

A SAILOR coming to Town on the outside of a coach from Plymouth, a few days since, after a long West India voyage, bartered two parrots, worth twenty guineas, with a poacher, his fellow traveller, for a leash of plover, and two brace of partridges; observing, with some very emphatic asseverations, that he was sick of their palaver, and very glad to get rid of them; especially as, instead of feeding them, he had got something in their place to feed himself.

THE HIGH COURT OF DIANA.

POOR RENARD'S EXIT.

ON the breeze floats the echoing horn,
Now swelling, now dying away;
The fox-hound salutes the fresh morn,
And hails the new rising of day.
Yoix! yoix! talliho! talliho! to the chase,
Nor flag, whilst you fly in the glorious race;
Regardless of perils and dangers, my boys,
Seize, seize while you can, these delectable joys!
Now splashing
And dashing
The steep hills we climb:
Now chasing
And racing
We strain ev'ry limb.
Talliho! yoix! yoix! talliho!

At fault!——Remit your eager speed,
Draw up the tighten'd rein;
Breathe, breathe a while th' impetuous steed,
His furious course restrain.
Another view!—Halloo!—Again then we fly,
And the speed of our strong pinion'd coursers we try;
Again ply the whistling lash
Again thro' the torrent we dash,
Down the vale sweep,
Climb up the steep,
O'er the wall leap.
Talliho!

Huntsman! press on each lazy hound
And cheer the lab'ring pack;
Let through the woods the bugle sound,
The whip loud clanging crack!
Now Wanton heads,
Now Ranger leads,
Old Tuneful yields the race;
But now again each nerve he strains,
Once more the foremost place regains,
And heads the thund'ring chase.

Thus flew Tydides o'er the Trojan plain,
Enwrapt in sable night,
Whilst hapless Dolon gave in vain
His fearful soul to flight;
Pale terror wing'd his steps, and fear inspir'd,
Revenge and fury fierce Tydides fir'd.

Poor renard's speed exhausted, spent appears,
Close at his heels th' insatiate pack he hears;
To him their yell forebodes approaching death;
He pants, he fumes, scarce draws his shorten'd breath.
How low he drags his miry brush along!
How from his jaw depends his thirsty tongue!
Where, where are now thy tricks and knavery flown!
Poor renard! where thy wily cunning gone?

So close th' infuriate pack thy steps pursuing,
All, all can't save thee from impending ruin.
No more shalt thou disturb the plumy breed,
No more by thee the roosted cock shall bleed;
No more thou'lt fatten by nocturnal spoils,
Nor angry peasants curse thy roguish wiles.
Now, villian, now expect thy seemly fate,
And blood by blood prepare to expiate.
At last, no more the wretched plund'rer flies,
O'ertaken, seiz'd, he snarls—and groans—and—dies.
Th' assembled village raise the gladsome song,
The sounding horns th' inspiring strain prolong;
One universal shout applauds the deed,
All joyful view th' atrocious felon bleed.

IN

THE GAY DECEIVERS.

SIR HARRY POPINJAY.

TIME was, if Poets tell us true,
When Cupid shot envenom'd arrows;
They pierced the heart quite thro' and thro',
And kill'd Arcadians like cock-sparrows.

What say our modern Gentlemen?
Can Cupid's darts with poison fill us?
No, faith, they tickle, now and then—
But curse me, if they ever kill us!

The mother of the spiteful boy
Left many likenesses behind her;
And if we find one Venus coy,
We soon may meet a dozen kinder.

Then what is Love?—A bagatelle.
What are the pains that we endure for't?
A bottle often makes us well—
But marriage is a certain cure for't.

PEGASUS PUNCHEON.

TUNE—Away with this whining and sadness.

AWAY with those poor married fellows,
Whose dearies are reckon'd divine!
A husband can never be jealous,
Whose wife is as frightful as mine.
Since deformity's stamp is upon her,
I cry, when abroad I would stump,
" Adieu! if I can't trust your honour,
My love, I rely on your hump,"
Then away with those poor married fellows, &c.

Married beauties may yield to a stranger;
My Rib need not dread such disgrace;
Her virtue is never in danger,
The moment you look at her face.
But her face has not many beholders;
For, at those who are false to their bed,
So high she has shrugg'd up her shoulders,
They almost have cover'd her head.
Then away, &c.

I am safe from each common occasion
That troubles a married man's life;
And, even in case of invasion,
I've nothing to fear for my wife.
Nay, if death in the church-yard had laid her,
I shouldn't much weep at my fate;
But nature so crooked has made her,
I'm sure I shan't bury her straight.

THE NORMAN HORSE-SHOE.

RED glows the forge in Striguil's bounds,
And hammers din and anvil sounds;
And armourers with iron toil,
Barb many a steed for battle's broil:

Foul fall the hand which bends the steel,
Around the courser's thundering heel,
That e'er shall dint a sable wound
On fair Glamorgan's velvet ground.

From Chepstow's walls, at dawn of morn,
Was heard a-far the bugle horn,
And forth in banded pomp and pride,
Stout Clare and fiery Neville ride;
They swear their banners broad should gleam
In crimson light on Rymny's stream;
They vow'd Caerphili's sod should feel
The Norman charger's spurning heel.

And sooth they swore—The sun arose,
And Rymny's wave with crimson glows;
For Clare's red banner floating wide,
Roll'd down the stream to Severn's tide.
And sooth they vow'd—The trampled green,
Show'd where hot Neville's charge had been;
In every sable hoof-tram stood
A Norman horseman's curdling blood.

Old Chepstow's brides may curse the toil
That arm'd stout Clare for Cambrian broil;
Their orphan's long the art may rue,
For Neville's war-horse forg'd the shoe!
No more the stamp of armed steed
Shall dint Glamorgan's velvet meed;
Nor trace be there in early spring,
Save of the Fairies' emerald ring.

HE HEAV'D A SIGH, AND DIED FOR LOVE.

SURE Susan was a perfect beauty,
As ever wore her own long hair:
Perhaps her colour might be sooty,
But then that made her teeth look fair.

Her eyes wer'n't scalded gooseberries neither,
Though envy had the same reported,
But grey and lively red together,
Her lovely orbs their beauties sported.

Her person might be rather crooked,
But mild in temper as a dove;
Askaunt on Lubin's face she looked,
He heav'd a sigh and dy'd for love.

Kingsland, Sept. 1804. J. M.

THE TURF IMPROVED; OR, JOCKEYSHIP COMPLETE.

A NEW SONG, WRITTEN BY A NORTH-COUNTRY SPORTSMAN.

On the Race which took place at York, on Saturday, August 25, 1804, between Mr. Flint and Mrs. Thornton, for 500 Guineas, and 1000 Guineas bye.

NEW schemes and new fancies we meet with in life,
To-day perhaps friends, but to-morrow at strife;
Such wonders as these shall ne'er trouble my mind,
As now on the turf fresh wonders I find.
Derry down, &c.

Have done with your sweatings, ye Jockeys, I pray,
For a Lady 's to ride—that 's the talk of the day—
A match for five hundred, and one thousand bye,
And if she comes first, many folks will look shy.

The Lady has spirit, I'd have you to know,
And on horseback can grace and agility show;
Undaunted she mounts, rallies nobly her steed,
And shews to beholders her courser has speed.

Perhaps you may smile when you think on this race,
And conjecture 'twill bring the Fair Sex to disgrace;
But that is a notion I'd have you discard,
For why should the fair from their whims be debarr'd?

The

The beau monde will condemn what I write, beyond doubt,
And some simp'ring young Misses will
giggle and pout;
But the odds that I bet shall be twenty
to one,
That such an exploit ne'er by Woman
was done.

I've rode many miles, Sirs, to see this same match,
And my money I'll bet, if the odds I
can catch,
That Old Vingarillo Young Thornville
shall beat,
And the Lady rides stoutly the whole
four-mile heat.

ON MIRTH.

Such joys as these if thou can'st give,
Mirth, with thee I mean to live.
L'ALLEGRO.

FOOLISH the man, who wastes his prime
In thought and care, who, scarce alive,
Never partakes the joys sublime,
Which sprightly Mirth was form'd to give.

Thee, Mirth! in ev'ry shape I'll woo,
In ev'ry gay and sportive dress;
Thy public joys unnumber'd know,
And haunt thee in each close recess.

Let the capacious bowl be mine;
Let me its nectar'd juices drain—
Juices which ev'ry thought refine,
In which ten thousand pictures reign.

Let music's gayest airs inspire,
And tune my mind for scenes of joy:
Its magic sweetness ne'er can tire,
Nor can its various charms e'er cloy.

The jovial song, the sprightly dance,
The well-wrought tale, the hum'rous
jest,
Shall all their pleasing aid advance,
Each in their turn t' swell the rest.

Love, too, I'll seek in myrtle bow'rs,
Lock'd in the arms of Lesbia fair;
On beds of moss, bedeck'd with flow'rs,
The moments sport, nor think on care.

Since life abounds in paths so green,
And can such various pleasures give,
Who to avoid them should be seen?
Who would with Mirth refuse to live?

STANZAS
ON AN OLD BLIND HORSE.

In the possession of the Bishop of Dromore.

WHAT, tho' the icy hand of time
Has cool'd thy ardour, cramp'd
thy speed,
Yet still thou rear'st thy crest sublime—
Yet still thou stepp'st—a comely steed.

Tho now those orbs are quench'd in night,
That sparkled once with youthful fire;
Yet, cherish'd by instinctive light,
Thy noble spirit's still entire.

Thy symmetry remains complete,
Still graceful flows thy mantling mane,
Thy taper ears, thy well-set feet,
Thy pristine beauty still retain.

That shining skin, so soft and sleek,
That trim-tail's fashionable air,
Thy master's kind regard bespeak,
And shew his servant's duteous care.

Old Steed! sure 'twas a lucky day
That brought thee first to such a birth—
While others drudge their lives away,
Thine flows in feasting, ease, and mirth.

And could a Poet's wish prevail,
When here thy vital race is run,
Thy form should still thro' ether sail—
A sprightly courser of the sun.
